5. No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies, or theological or religious seminaries.

6. The civil and religious rights, privileges, and capacities of no individual shall be diminished or enlarged on account of his opinions or belief concerning matters of religion.

All persons shall, before conviction, be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offences, when the proof is evident or the presumption great; and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

13. Every person has a right to bear arms for the defence of himself and the State.

14. The military shall, in all cases and at all times, be in strict subordination to the civil power.

15. No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner prescribed by law.

ARTICLE IV.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

1. The legislative power shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives.

2. The number of the members of the House of Representatives shall never be less than forty-eight, nor more than one hundred; and the Senate shall at all times equal in number one-third of the House of Representatives, as nearly as may be.

3. The Legislature shall provide by law for an enumeration of the inhabitants of this State in the years one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and one thousand eight hundred and forty five, and every ten years after the said last mentioned time; and at their first session after each enumeration so made as aforesaid, and also after each enumeration made by the authority of the United States, the legislature shall apportion anew the Representatives and Senators among the several counties and districts, according to the number of white inhabitants.

4. The Representatives shall be chosen annually on the first Monday of November, and on the following day, by the electors of the several counties or districts into which the State shall be divided for that purpose. Each organized county shall be entitled to at least one Representative; but no county hereafter organized shall be entitled to a separate Representative until it shall have attained a population equal to the ratio of representation hereafter established.

5. The Senators shall be chosen for two years, at the same time and in the same manner as the Representatives are required to be chosen. At the first session of the Legislature under this constitution, they shall be divided by lot from their respective districts, as nearly as may be, into two equal classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the first year, and of the second class at the expiration of the second year, so that one-half thereof, as nearly as may be, shall be chosen annually thereafter.

6. The State shall be divided at each new apportionment, into a number of not less than four, nor more than eight, senatorial districts, to be always composed of contiguous territory; so that each district shall elect an equal number of Senators, annually, as nearly as may be; and no county shall be divided in the formation of such districts.

7. Senators and Representatives shall be citizens of the United States, and be qualified electors in the respective counties and districts which they represent; and a removal from their respective counties or districts shall be deemed a vacation of their seats.

8. No person holding any office under the United States, or of this State, officers of the militia, justices of the peace, associate judges of the circuit and county courts, and post masters excepted, shall be eligible to either house of the Legislature.

9. Senators and Representatives shall, in all cases except treason, felony or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest; nor shall they be subject to any civil process during the session of the Legislature, nor for fifteen days next before the commencement and after the termination of each session.

10. A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may provide. Each house shall choose its own officers.

11. Each house shall determine the rules of its proceedings, and judge of the qualifications, elections and returns of its own members; and may, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected, expel a member; but no member shall be expelled a second time for the same cause, nor for any cause known to his constituents antecedent to his election.

12. Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same, except such parts as may require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the request of one-fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal. Any member of either house shall have liberty to dissent from and protest against any act or resolution which he may think injurious to the public or an individual, and have the reasons of his dissent entered on the journal.

13. In all elections by either or both houses, the votes shall be given viva voce; and all votes on nominations made to the Senate, shall be taken by yeas and nays, and published with the journal of its proceedings.

14. The doors of each house shall be open, except when the public welfare shall require secrecy; neither house shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that where the Legislature may then be in session.

15. Any bill may originate in either house of the Legislature.

16. Every bill passed by the Legislature shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members present agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other house, by whom it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved also by two-thirds of all the members present in that house, it shall become a law; but in such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for or against the bill shall be entered on the journals of each house respectively; and if any bill be not returned by the Governor within ten days, Sundays excepted, after it has been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Legislature, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall not become a law.

17. Every resolution to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, except in cases of adjournment, shall be presented to the Governor, and before the same shall take effect, shall be proceeded upon in the same manner as in the case of a bill.

18. The members of the Legislature shall receive for their services a compensation to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the public treasury; but no increase of the compensation shall take effect during the term for which the members of either house shall have been elected; and such compensation shall never exceed three dollars a day.

19. No member of the Legislature shall receive any civil appointment from the Governor and Senate, or from the Legislature, during the term for which he is elected.

20. The Governor shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies as may occur in the Senate and House of Representatives.

21. The Legislature shall meet on the first Monday in January, in every year, and at no other period, unless otherwise directed by law, or provided for in this constitution.

22. The style of the laws of this State shall be: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan."

ARTICLE V.

1. The supreme executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall hold his office for two years; and a Lieutenant Governor shall be chosen at the same time and for the same term.

2. No person shall be eligible to the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor, who shall not have been five years a citizen of the United States, and a resident of this State two years next preceding the election.

3. The Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be elected by the electors at the times and places of choosing members of the Legislature. The persons having the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be elected; but in case two or more have an equal and the highest number of votes for Governor or Lieutenant Governor, the Legislature shall, by joint vote, choose one of the said persons so having an equal and the highest number of votes, for Governor or Lieutenant Governor.

9. He shall have power to adjourn the Legislature to such time as he may think proper, in case of a disagreement between the two houses with respect to the time of adjournment, but not to a period beyond the next annual meeting.

10. He may direct the Legislature to meet at some other place than the seat of government, if that shall become, after its adjournment, dangerous from a common enemy or a contagious disease.

11. He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons after conviction, except in cases of impeachment.

12. When any office, the appointment to which is vested in the Governor and Senate, or in the Legislature, becomes vacant during the recess of the Legislature, the Governor shall have power to fill such vacancy by granting a commission, which shall expire at the end of the succeeding session of the Legislature.

13. In case of the impeachment of the Governor, his removal from office, death, resignation, or absence from the State, the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the Lieutenant Governor until such disability shall cease, or the vacancy be filled.

14. If, during the vacancy of the office of Governor, the Lieutenant Governor shall be impeached, displaced, resign, die, or be absent from the State, the President of the Senate, pro tempore, shall act as Governor, until the vacancy be filled.

15. The Lieutenant Governor shall, by virtue of his office, be President of the Senate; in committee of the whole, he may debate on all questions; and when there is an equal division, he shall give the casting vote.

16. No member of Congress, nor any other person holding office under the United States, or this State, shall execute the office of Governor.

17. Whenever the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor becomes vacant, the person exercising the powers of Governor for the time being shall give notice thereof, and the electors shall, at the next succeeding annual election for members of the Legislature, choose a person to fill such vacancy.

18. The Governor shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the term for which he has been elected.

19. The Lieutenant Governor, except when acting as Governor, and the President of the Senate pro tempore, shall each receive the same compensation as shall be allowed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

20. A great seal for the State shall be provided by the Governor, which shall contain the device and inscriptions represented and described in the papers relating thereto, signed by the President of the Convention, and deposited in the office of the Secretary of the Territory. A removal of any justice from the township in which he was elected, shall vacate his office. In all incorporated towns, or cities, it shall be competent for the Legislature to increase the number of justices.

10. The first Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall hold their offices until the first Monday of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, and until others shall be elected and qualified; and thereafter they shall hold their offices for two years, and until their successors shall be elected and qualified.

11. When a vacancy shall happen, occasioned by the death, resignation or removal from office of any person holding office under this State, the successor thereto shall hold his office for the period which his predecessor had to serve, and no longer, unless again chosen or re-appointed.

ARTICLE XIII.

1. That no inconvenience may arise from a change of the territorial government to a permanent State government, it is declared that all writs, actions, prosecutions, contracts, claims and rights of individuals and of bodies corporate, shall continue as if no change had taken place in this government; and all process which may, before the organization of the judi-

6. The first election for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, members of the State Legislature, and a Representative in the Congress of the United States, shall be held on the first Monday in October next, and on the succeeding day. At the election aforesaid, on such of the ballots as are for the said constitution, shall be written or printed the word "yes," and on those which are against the ratification of said constitution, the word "no." And the returns of the votes on the question of ratification [or rejection] of said constitution, shall be made to the President of this Convention at any time before the first Monday in November next, and a digest of the same communicated by him to the Senate and House of Representatives on that day.

10. And if this constitution shall be ratified by the people of Michigan, the President of this Convention shall, immediately after the same shall be ascertained, cause a fair copy thereof, together with an authenticated copy of the act of the Legislative Council, entitled "An act to enable the people of Michigan to form a constitution and State government," approved January twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and thirty-five, providing for the calling of this Convention, and also a copy of so much of the last census of this territory as exhibits the number of free inhabitants of that part thereof which is comprised within the limits in said constitution defined as the boundaries of the proposed State of Michigan, to be forwarded to the President of the United States, together with an expression of the decided opinion of this Convention, that the number of the free inhabitants of said proposed State now exceeds the number requisite to constitute two congressional districts, and the respectful request of this Convention, in behalf of the people of Michigan, that all said matters may be by him laid before the the Congress of the United States at their next session.

AMENDMENTS.

[The following amendment to the constitution was proposed by the Legislature in 1838, referred to the Legislature of 1839, agreed to in 1839 by two-thirds of all the members elected to each house, submitted to the people and approved and ratified at an election held in November, 1839:]

AMENDMENT NO. I.

That so much of the first section of the second article of the Constitution as prescribes the place in which an elector may vote, and which is in these words, to wit: "district, county or township," be abolished, and that the following be substituted in the place thereof, to wit: "township or ward."

[The following amendment was proposed in 1842, and referred to the next Legislature, submitted to the people by a joint resolution, approved March 9, 1843, and approved and ratified at the election in November, 1843:]

AMENDMENT NO. II.

That the constitution of this State be so amended, that every law authorizing the borrowing of money or the issuing of State stocks, whereby a debt shall be created on the credit of the State, shall specify the object for which the money shall be appropriated; and that every such law shall embrace no more than one such object, which shall be simply and specifically stated; and that no such law shall take effect until it shall be submitted to the people at the next general election, and be approved by a majority of the votes cast for and against it at such election; that all money to be raised by the authority of such law be applied to the specific object stated in such law, and to no other purpose, except the payment of such debt thereby created. This provision shall not extend or apply to any law to raise money for defraying the actual expenses of the Legislature, the judicial and State officers, for suppressing insurrection, repelling invasion or defending the State in time of war. [See note.]

[The following amendment was proposed in 1843, referred to the next Legislature, agreed to in 1844 by two-thirds of all the members elected to each house, submitted to the people, and ratified and approved at the election in November, 1844:]

AMENDMENT NO. III.

Strike out of section four of article four, the words "on the first Monday in November and on the following day," and insert the words "On the first Tuesday," so that said section will read:

The Representatives shall be chosen annually on the first Tuesday of November, by the electors of the several counties or districts into which the State shall be divided for that purpose. [See Note.]

[The following amendment was proposed in 1848, referred to the Legislature of 1849, agreed to by two-thirds of all the members elected to each house, submitted to the people, and approved and ratified at the election held in November, 1849.]

AMENDMENT NO. IV.

The Legislature of this State for the year eighteen hundred and fifty shall provide by law for the election by the people of the following officers, viz: "Judges of the Supreme Court, who shall be ineligible to any other than a judicial office during the term for which they are elected, and for one year thereafter; Auditor General, State Treasurer, Secretary of State, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, and Prosecuting Attorneys; and the said judges are prohibited from receiving any fees of office or other compensation than their salaries, for any civil duties performed by them."

NOTE.—Amendment No. 2, does not appear to have been agreed to by the Legislature of 1843, as the constitution requires. All that appears in the published laws of that year in reference to it, is Joint Resolution No. 22, which provides that it be submitted to the people at the then next general election; but makes no provision for the return or canvass of the votes. The votes, however, were returned, and canvassed by the board of State canvassers, and the result thus ascertained to be in favor of the amendment.

It appears from the journal of the house of Representative for 1843, that on the 16th of February, the joint resolution of the previous Legislature, proposing this amendment, was called up, and the House refused to agree—yeas 34, nays 15; which vote was, on the same day, reconsidered, (House Journal, p. 301, 303.) On the 9th of March, "the joint resolution amending the constitution was considered, the rules suspended, and the same adopted," (House Journal, p. 350,) but the yeas and nays were not entered upon the journal.

On the same day, the "joint resolution in relation to the amendment of the constitution," proposed by the Legislature in 1842, was taken up in the Senate and adopted—yeas 15, nays 3. (Senate Journal, p. 412.) A message was afterwards on that day received from the House, transmitting "joint resolution in relation to amendment of constitution," which the House had passed, and the rule was thereupon suspended, and the resolution adopted, the yeas and nays not being entered upon the journal. (Senate Journal, p. 418, 419.)

On that day, a message from the Senate was received by the House, returning "joint resolution in relation to the amendment of the constitution," and advising the House that the Senate had concurred therein; and the same was thereupon ordered to be enrolled. (House Journal, p. 533 & 534.)

On the same day, a message was received by the House from the Governor, advising the House that he had approved and deposited with the Secretary of State "joint resolution for amending the constitution of the State of Michigan." (House Journal, p. 538.)

It seems, therefore, to be a matter of doubt whether the resolution of 1842, relative to borrowing money, &c., was actually agreed to by the Legislature of 1843. The resolution for submitting the amendment to the people, is entitled "Joint Resolution."

Amendment No. 3, as proposed in 1843, was modified in form, but not in substance, by the joint resolution approved January 16, 1844. The words stricken out, and those inserted by this amendment, leave no designation of the month in which the election is to be holden, yet the section is made to read as though the words "of November" had not been stricken out.

The language of the amendment also implies that the reading of the whole of section 4, of article 4 of the constitution, is given in the resolution, whereas it includes only the first clause of that section.

REVISED CONSTITUTION, 1850.

The People of the State of Michigan do ordain this Constitution.

Such districts shall be numbered from one to thirty-two inclusive; each of which shall choose one Senator. No county shall be divided in the formation of senate districts, except such county shall be equitably entitled to two or more Senators.

Sec. 3. The House of Representatives shall consist of not less than sixty-four, nor more than one hundred members. Representatives shall be chosen for two years, and by single districts. Each representative district shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of white inhabitants, and civilized persons of Indian descent not members of any tribe, and shall consist of convenient and contiguous territory. But no township or city shall be divided in the formation of a representative district. When any township or city shall contain a population which entitles it to more than one Representative, then such township or city shall elect by general ticket the number of Representatives to which it is entitled. Each county hereafter organized, with such territory as may be attached thereto, shall be entitled to a separate Representative when it has attained a population equal to a moiety of the ratio of representation. In every county entitled to more than one Representative, the board of supervisors shall assemble at such time and place as the Legislature shall prescribe, and divide the same into representative districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such county is entitled by law, and shall cause to be filed in the offices of Secretary of State and clerk of such county, a description of such representative districts, specifying the number of each district, and the population thereof, according to the last preceding enumeration.

Sec. 4. The Legislature shall provide by law for an enumeration of the inhabitants in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-four, and every ten years thereafter; and at the first session after each enumeration so made, and also at the first session after each enumeration by the authority of the United States, the Legislature shall re-arrange the Senate districts, and apportion anew the Representatives among the counties and districts, according to the number of white inhabitants and civilized persons of Indian descent, not members of any tribe. Each apportionment, and the division into representative districts by any board of supervisors, shall remain unaltered until the return of another enumeration.

Sec. 5. Senators and Representatives shall be citizens of the United States, and qualified electors in the respective counties and districts which they represent. A removal from their respective counties or districts shall be deemed a vacation of their office.

Sec. 6. No person holding any office under the United States [or this State,] or any county office, except notaries public, officers of the militia, and officers elected by townships, shall be eligible to or have a seat in either house of the Legislature; and all votes given for any such person shall be void.

Sec. 7. Senators and Representatives shall, in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest. They shall not be subject to any civil process during the session of the Legislature, or for fifteen days next before the commencement and after the termination of each session; they shall not be questioned in any other place for any speech in either house.

Sec. 8. A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may prescribe.

Sec. 9. Each house shall choose its own officers, determine the rules of its proceedings, and judge of the qualifications, election and returns of its members; and may, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected, expel a member. No member shall be expelled a second time for the same cause; nor for any cause known to his constituents antecedent to his election; the reason for such expulsion shall be entered upon the journal, with the names of the members voting on the question.

Sec. 10. Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same, except such parts as may require seerecy. The yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall be entered on the journal at the request of one-fifth of the members elected. Any member of either house may dissent from and protest against any act, proceeding or resolution which he may deem injurious to any person or the public, and have the reason of his dissent entered on the journal.

Sec. 11. In all elections by either house, or in joint convention, the votes shall be given viva voce. All votes on nominations to the Senate, shall be taken by yeas and nays, and published with the journal of its proceedings.

Sec. 13. Bills may originate in either house of the Legislature.

Sec. 14. Every bill and concurrent resolution, except of adjournment, passed by the Legislature, shall be presented to the Governor before it becomes a law. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated, which shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and reconsider it. On such reconsideration, if two-thirds of the members elected agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent with the objections to the other house, by which it shall be reconsidered. If approved by two-thirds of the members elected to that house, it shall become a law. In such case, the vote of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays; and the names of the members voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journals of each house respectively. If any bill be not returned by the Governor within ten days, Sundays excepted, after it has been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Legislature, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall not become a law. The Governor may approve, sign, and file in the office of the Secretary of State, within five days after the adjournment of the Legislature, any act passed during the last five days of the session; and the same shall become a law.

Sec. 15. No member of the Legislature shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract with the State, or any county thereof, authorized by any law passed during the time for which he is elected, nor for one year thereafter.

Sec. 19. Every bill and joint resolution shall be read three times in each house before the final passage thereof. The Legislature shall prescribe by law the manner in which the State printing shall be executed, and the accounts rendered therefor; and shall prohibit all charges for constructive labor. They shall not rescind nor alter such contract, nor release the person nor persons taking the same, or his or their sureties, from the performance of any of the conditions of the contract. No member of the Legislature nor officer of the State shall be interested directly or indirectly in any such contract.

Sec. 15. No general revision of the laws shall hereafter be made. When a reprint thereof becomes necessary, the Legislature in joint convention shall appoint a suitable person to collect together such acts and parts of acts as are in force, and without alteration, arrange them under appropriate heads and titles. The laws so arranged shall be submitted to two commissioners appointed by the Governor for examination, and if certified by them to be a correct compilation of all general laws in force, shall be printed in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. 2. At the general election to be held in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and in each sixteenth year thereafter; and also at such other times as the Legislature may by law provide, the question of a general revision of the constitution shall be submitted to the electors qualified to vote for members of the legislature; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified, voting at such election, shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the legislature, at the next session, shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such convention. All the amendments shall take effect at the commencement of the political year after their adoption:

SCHEDULE.

That no inconvenience may arise from the changes in the constitution of this State, and in order to carry the same into complete operation, it is hereby declared, that

Sec. 1. The common law and the statute laws now in force, not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations, or are altered or repealed by the Legislature.

Sec. 2. All writs, actions, causes of action, prosecutions and rights of individuals and of bodies corporate, and of the State, and all charters of incorporation, shall continue; and all indictments which shall have been found, or which may hereafter be found, for any crime or offence committed before the adoption of this constitution, may be proceeded upon as if no change had taken place. The several courts, except as herein otherwise provided, shall continue with the like powers and jurisdiction, both at law and in equity, as if this constitution had not been adopted, and until the organization of the judicial department under this constitution.

Sec. 3. That all fines, penalties, forfeitures, and escheats accruing to the State of Michigan under the present constitution and laws, shall accrue to the use of the State under this constitution.

Sec. 4. That all recognizances, bonds, obligations and all other instruments entered into or executed before the adoption of this constitution, to the people of the State of Michigan, to any State, county or township, or any public officer or public body, or which may be entered into or executed under existing laws "to the people of the State of Michigan," to any such officer or public body, before the complete organization of the departments of government under this constitution, shall remain binding and valid; and rights and liabilities upon the same shall continue, and may be prosecuted as provided by law. And all crimes and misdemeanors and penal actions, shall be tried, punished and prosecuted, as though no change had taken place, until otherwise provided by law.

Sec. 5. A Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be chosen under the existing constitution and laws, to serve after the expiration of the term of the present incumbent.

Sec. 6. All officers, civil and military, now holding any office or appointment, shall continue to hold their respective offices, unless removed by competent authority, until superseded under the laws now in force, or under this constitution.

Sec. 7. The members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Legislature of one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one shall continue in office, under the provisions of law, until superseded by their successors, elected and qualified under this constitution."

Sec. 8. All county officers, unless removed by competent authority, shall continue to hold their respective offices until the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three. The laws now in force as to the election, qualification and duties of township officers, shall continue in force until the Legislature shall, in conformity to the provisions of this constitution, provide for the holding of elections to fill such offices, and prescribe the duties of such officers respectively.

Sec. 9. On the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two, the terms of office of the judges of the Supreme Court under existing laws, and of the judges of the County Courts, and of the clerks of the Supreme Court, shall expire on the said day.

Sec. 10. On the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two, the jurisdiction of all suits and proceedings then pending in the present Supreme Court, shall become vested in the Supreme Court established by this constitution, and shall be finally adjudicated by the court where the same may be pending. The jurisdiction of all suits and proceedings at law and equity, then pending in the Circuit Courts and County Courts for the several counties, shall become vested in the Circuit Court of the said counties, and District Court of the upper peninsula.

Sec. 11. The probate courts, the courts of justices of the peace, and the police court authorized by an act entitled "an act to establish a police court in the city of Detroit," approved April second, one thousand eight hundred and fifty, shall continue to exercise the jurisdiction and powers now conferred upon them respectively, until otherwise provided by law.

Sec. 12. The office of State printer shall be vested in the present incumbent until the expiration of the term for which he was elected under the law then in force; and all the provisions of the said law relating to his duties, rights, privileges and compensation, shall remain unimpaired and inviolate until the expiration of his said term of office.

Sec. 13. It shall be the duty of the Legislature, at their first session, to adapt the present laws to the provisions of this constitution, as far as may be.

Sec. 14. The Attorney General of the State is required to prepare and report to the Legislature, at the commencement of the next session, such changes and modifications in existing laws as may be deemed necessary to adapt the same to this constitution, and as may be best calculated to carry into effect its provisions; and he shall receive no additional compensation therefor.

Sec. 15. Any territory attached to any county for judicial purposes, if not otherwise represented, shall be considered as forming part of such county, so far as regards elections for the purpose of representation.

Sec. 16. This constitution shall be submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection, at the general election to be held on the first Tuesday of November, one thousand eight hundred and fifty; and there shall also be submitted for adoption or rejection, at the same time, the separate resolution in relation to the elective franchise; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, and all other officers required to give or publish any notice in regard to the said general election, to give notice as provided by law in case of an election of Governor, that this constitution has been duly submitted to the electors at said election. Every newspaper within this State publishing in the month of September next, this constitution as submitted, shall receive as compensation therefor, the sum of twenty-five dollars, to be paid as the Legislature shall direct.

Sec. 17. Any person entitled to vote for members of the Legislature, by the constitution and laws now in force, shall, at the said election, be entitled to vote for the adoption or rejection of this constitution, and for or against the resolution separately submitted, at the places and in the manner provided by law for the election of members of the Legislature.

Sec. 18. At the said general election, a ballot box shall be kept by the several boards of inspectors thereof, for receiving the votes cast for or against the adoption of this constitution; and on the ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "adoption of the constitution—yes," or "adoption of the constitution—no."

Sec. 19. The canvass of the votes cast for the adoption or rejection of this constitution, and the provision in relation to the elective franchise separately submitted, and the returns thereof, shall be made by the proper canvassing officers, in the same manner as now provided by law for the canvass and return of the votes cast at an election for Governor, as near as may be; and the return thereof shall be directed to the Secretary of State. On the sixteenth day of December next, or within five days thereafter, the Auditor General, State Treasurer and Secretary of State shall meet at the Capitol, and proceed, in presence of the Governor, to examine and canvass the returns of the said votes, and proclamation shall forthwith be made by the Governor of the result thereof. If it shall appear that a majority of the votes cast upon the question have thereon "Adoption of the constitution—yes," this constitution shall be the supreme law of the State from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, except as is herein otherwise provided; but if a majority of the votes cast upon the question have thereon "Adoption of the constitution—no," the same shall be null and void. And in case of the adoption of this constitution, said officers shall immediately, or as soon thereafter as practicable, proceed to open the statements of votes returned from the several counties for judges of the Supreme Court and State officers, under the act entitled "an act to amend the revised statutes and to provide for the election of certain officers by the people, in pursuance to an amendment of the constitution," approved February sixteenth, one thousand eight hundred and fifty, and shall ascertain, determine and certify the results of the election for said officers under said acts, in the same manner, as near as may be, as is now provided by law in regard to the election of Representatives in Congress. And the several judges and officers so ascertained to have been elected, may be qualified and enter upon the duties of their respective offices, on the first Monday of January next, or as soon thereafter as practicable.

Sec. 20. The salaries or compensation of all persons holding office under the present constitution shall continue to be the same as now provided by law, until superseded by their successors elected or appointed under this constitution; and it shall not be lawful hereafter for the Legislature to increase or diminish the compensation of any officer during the term for which he is elected or appointed.

Sec. 21. The Legislature, at their first session, shall provide for the payment of all expenditures of the Convention to revise the constitution, and of the publication of the same as is provided in this article.

Sec. 22. Every county except Mackinac and Chippewa, entitled to a representative in the Legislature, at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall continue to be so entitled under this constitution; and the county of Saginaw, with the territory that may be attached, shall be entitled to one Representative; the county of Tuscola, and the territory that may be attached, one Representative; the county of Sanilac, and the territory that may be attached, one Representative; the counties of Midland and Aronac, with the territory that may be attached, one Representative; the county of Montcalm, with the territory that may be attached thereto, one Representative; and the counties of Newaygo and Oceana, with the territory that may be attached thereto, one Representative. Each county having a ratio of representation and a fraction over, equal to a moiety of said ratio, shall be entitled to two representatives,

Sec. 23. The cases pending and undisposed of in the late court of chancery, at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall continue to be heard and determined by the judges of the Supreme Court. But the Legislature shall, at its session in one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, provide by law for the transfer of said causes that may remain undisposed of on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two, to the Supreme or Circuit Court, established by this constitution, or require that the same may be heard and determined by the circuit judges.

Sec. 24. The term of office of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall commence on the first day of January next after their election.

Sec. 25. The territory described in the article entitled "Upper Peninsula," shall be attached to and constitute a part of the third circuit for the election of a regent of the University.

Sec. 26. The Legislature shall have authority, after the expiration of the term of office of the district judge first elected for the upper peninsula, to abolish said office of district judge and district attorney, or either of them.

Sec. 27. The Legislature shall, at its session of one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, apportion the Representatives among the several counties and districts, and divide the State into Senate districts, pursuant to the provisions of this constitution.

Sec. 28. The terms of office of all State and county officers, of the circuit judges, members of the board of education, and members of the Legislature, shall begin on the first day of January next succeeding their election.

Sec. 29. The State, exclusive of the upper peninsula, shall be divided into eight judicial circuits, and the counties of Monroe, Lenawee and Hillsdale shall constitute the first circuit; the counties of Branch, St. Joseph, Cass and Berrien, shall constitute the second circuit; the county of Wayne shall constitute the third circuit; the counties of Washtenaw, Jackson and Ingham shall constitute the fourth circuit; the counties of Calhoun, Kalamazoo, Allegan, Eaton and Van Buren, shall constitute the fifth circuit; [the] counties of St. Clair, Macomb, Oakland and Sanilac shall constitute the sixth circuit; the counties of Lapeer, Genesee, Saginaw, Shiawassee, Livingston, Tuscola and Midland shall constitute the seventh circuit; and the counties of Barry, Kent, Ottawa, Ionia, Clinton and Montcalm shall constitute the eighth circuit."

RESOLUTION.

Sec. 30. At the next general election, and at the same time when the votes of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of this constitution, an additional amendment to section one of article seven, in the words following:

"Every colored male inhabitant possessing the qualifications required by the first section of the second article of the constitution, shall have the rights and privileges of an elector,"

Shall be separately submitted to the electors of this State for their adoption or rejection, in form following, to wit: A separate ballot may be given by every person having the right to vote for the revised constitution, to be deposited in a separate box. Upon the ballots given for the adoption of the said separate amendment shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? Yes;" and upon all ballots given against the adoption of the said separate amendment, in like manner, the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? No." And on such ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Constitution: Suffrage," in such manner that such words shall appear on the outer side of such ballot when folded. If, at said election, a majority of all the votes given for and against the said separate amendment shall contain the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? Yes;" then there shall be inserted in the first section of the article, between the words "tribe" and "shall," these words: "and every colored male inhabitant," anything in the constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

Done in Convention, at the capitol of the State, this fifteenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty, and of the Independence of the United States the seventy-fifth.

By the Governor of the State of Michigan.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by the schedule appended to the Constitution for the State of Michigan, submitted to the people by a convention of delegates at the Capitol of said State, the fifteenth day of August in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty, it is provided that on the sixteenth day of December then next, or within five days thereafter, the Auditor General, State Treasurer, and Secretary of State, shall meet at the Capitol and proceed in presence of the Governor to examine and canvass the returns of the votes cast for and against the adoption of said Constitution; and whereas, the officers above named, in presence of the Governor, having performed said duty within the time prescribed, and on the canvass of said votes, found that the total number given was forty-five thousand six hundred and twenty-seven; of which thirty-six thousand one hundred and sixty-nine, were given in favor of the adoption of said Constitution; nine thousand four hundred and thirty-three against its adoption; and twenty-five blank; Now, therefore, I, John S. Barry, Governor of said State of Michigan, as by said schedule required, do issue this my Proclamation, to make known that said Constitution has been duly adopted by a majority of the votes given upon the question of its adoption.

Done at Lansing, in said State, this nineteenth day of December, in the year of our [L. S.] Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty, and of the Independence of the United States the seventy-fifth.

By the Governor: JNO. S. BARRY.

C. H. TAYLOR, Secretary of State.

NOTE.

The Reporter appointed and required, under the resolution of August 14th, to superintend the publication of the Debates in the Convention, begs leave to state that in performing that duty he met with some difficulty, and therefore the work is not so complete as otherwise would have been the case, from the fact that several members took home their speeches to review, neglecting to return them. Owing to this, the Debates, in a few instances, appear somewhat disjointed and abrupt. Such as were returned before the volume was completed, will be found inserted in the Appendix.

CONVENTION

STATE OF MICHIGAN.

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
LANSING, MONDAY, JUNE 3, 1850.

In pursuance of the Act, approved March 9, 1850, providing "for the time, place, and manner of holding the Convention to Revise the Constitution," the Delegates assembled at the Capitol this day.

At 2 o'clock P. M., the Hon. CHARLES H. TAYLOR, Secretary of State, appeared and stated that he was present with the official List of Delegates, with the exception of Shiawassee county, returns from which had not been received.

He then proceeded to call the List, and all the Delegates answered to their names, except JOHN B. GRAHAM, of Hillsdale, CYRUS LOVELL, of Ionia, EBENEZER DANIELS, of Lenawee, HIRAM HATHAWAY, of Macomb, LORENZO M. MASON and REUBEN B. DIMOND, of St. Clair, and JAMES M. EDMUNDS, of Washtenaw.

Hon. F. J. PREVOST, of Shiawassee, afterwards presented his credentials and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. KINGSLEY, ISAAC E. CRARY, of Calhoun county, was appointed President pro tem.; and

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, D. P. BUSHNELL, of Wayne, was appointed Secretary pro tem.

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE, DIODATE HUBBARD was appointed Sergeant-at-Arms, pro tem.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved that the Convention proceed to the election of a President.

The CHAIR stated that the law provided that the election should be by ballot. He did not consider that provision of the act binding upon the Convention; but if no other mode was proposed, the election would be proceeded with in the manner prescribed.

Mr. McCLELLAND said: Mr. President, it is unusual to vote for the election of the presiding officer, in a body like this, by ballot. I do not think the Legislature had power over this matter. So far as I know, bodies like this vote viva voce. I am in favor of it, and therefore move that we proceed to vote for President viva voce.

Mr. WITHERELL said he did not think it absolutely necessary to go to the law for authority, but it might be a question of expediency. The law provides that the President shall be elected by ballot.

Mr. McCLELLAND—My object in making the motion was to save time. If there is to be any discussion, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE inquired if the constitution did not require a viva voce vote.

The CHAIR—Not in this case.

Mr. HANSCOM renewed the motion. The provision of the act had no power to bind the action of the convention. The Legislature (said Mr. H.) might as well have gone on and dictated the mode of all our proceedings. He would prefer the mode of election usually adopted in such bodies as this.

Mr. ROBERTS said it appeared to him, if the motion were carried, the Convention would be repudiating the action of the Legislature before its organization was completed. We may as well take a vote repudiating our own election.

Mr. McLEOD moved to lay the resolution on the table. Lost.

Mr. WITHERELL read the provision of law. He did not consider it binding on the Convention.

Mr. Redfield believed the law to be obligatory on the members. We cannot organize (said Mr. R.,) till we have complied with the provisions of law. When we have become organized we shall be in a different position.

The motion did not prevail, and the Convention proceeded to elect by ballot.

Messrs. STOREY, of Jackson county, and HANSCOM, of Oakland, having been appointed tellers, and the ballots having been counted, the following was the result:

For DANIEL GOODWIN,	75
" H. T. BACKUS,	3
" C. W. WHIPPLE,	2
" J. R. WILLIAMS,	3
" D. C. WALKER,	1
" I. E. CRARY,	2
" B. F. H. WITHERELL,	1
" H. G. WELLS,	1
" N. PIERCE,	1
" W. F. STOREY,	1

The PRESIDENT pro tem. announced that DANIEL GOODWIN, of Wayne county, having received the highest number of votes, was duly appointed President of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, of Berrien county,

A committee of two was ordered to be appointed to wait upon the President elect and conduct him to the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. appointed Messrs WHIPPLE, of Berrien, and McCLELLAND, of Monroe, such committee.

The PRESIDENT having taken the chair, addressed the Convention as follows:
Gentlemen of the Convention:

I tender to you my sincere thanks for the flattering expression of your confidence in selecting me to preside over your deliberations upon this interesting occasion. When I look around this Hall and behold congregated here so much of ability, of intelligence, and of experience in public affairs—so many who have occupied various stations in different departments of public service, with honor to themselves and usefulness to their fellow-citizens; and when I consider further the importance of the objects for which we are convened, I cannot but be impressed with deep sensibility for the distinguished honor conferred. The best requital which I can make will be in the devotion of my best powers to the faithful and impartial performance of the highly responsible duties of the station. This I shall endeavor to do in all sincerity. And though I do not bring to the task great familiarity with Parliamentary proceedings, yet with the aid (which I doubt not will be kindly and generously accorded) of the knowledge and experience that pervade this assembly of representatives of enlightened and free citizens, it is my hope that I shall be enabled so to fulfill it as to meet your approbation.

In conclusion, allow me to express the fervent desire that our deliberations may be so guided by that All-Wise Being in whose hands are the destinies of States and Nations, that their results may tend to establish more firmly and permanently those benign principles of civil freedom and popular sovereignty upon which our institutions are based, and promote in the highest degree the prosperity of our State and the happiness of our people.

On motion of Mr. COOK, of Hillsdale county, it was Resolved, That John SWEGLES, Jr., be and he is hereby appointed Secretary of this Convention.

Resolved further, That HORACE S. ROBERTS and CHARLES HASCALL be and they hereby are appointed Assistant Secretaries of this Convention.

Mr. HANSCOM offered a resolution, that the rules of the last House of Representatives be adopted, so far as they are applicable to the proceedings of this Convention, till otherwise ordered.

Mr. WITHERELL saw no necessity for the adoption of the resolution. It would be difficult to know what were applicable and what were not; a committee might be appointed that would shortly report rules which would be altogether applicable. There were probably not more than three members of the Convention who were in possession of the rules of the House.

Mr. HANSCOM contended that the Convention ought to have some rules for its government till a committee could prepare and report rules. At present (said Mr. H.) we are acting without any rule. The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS,

Resolved, That David Hubbard be appointed Sergeant-at-Arms of this Convention. Adopted.

By Mr. KINGSLEY:

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to prepare rules for the government of this Convention in its proceedings. Adopted.

MESSRS. KINGSLEY, BRITAIN, McCLELLAND, TIFFANY, BACKUS, WALKER and HANSCOM were appointed such committee.

Mr. CRARY offered the following:

Resolved, That the President of this Convention appoint a door-keeper and four messengers.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out the words "door-keeper and."

Mr. CRARY wished the gentleman to explain whether he did not think the Chair competent to appoint, or whether he considered a door-keeper unnecessary. Mr. C. said, it is necessary that we should have somebody to take care of the House, and clean the room, so that we may sit here in health and comfort. It is not the duty of the sergeant-at-arms or the messengers—it has usually been done by the fireman; but as the weather will probably be so warm that we shall not need fires, it would be more proper to appoint a person as door-keeper with instructions to attend to those duties.

Mr. FRALICK—The office is unnecessary. There is one more secretary appointed than is necessary.

Mr. CRARY—The secretary will not sweep the floor.

Mr. FRALICK—Perhaps not—we have been elected here because the taxes are too high. The law that called the Convention says nothing about a door-keeper. Under that we have no authority to appoint.

Mr. WITHERELL expressed his opinion to be in favor of the appointment.—Adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed by the President, to report the best mode of proceeding to revise the Constitution of the State.

Mr. McC. said he found this was usually the first proceeding of a convention. He was in favor of getting speedily to work, that they might have more time for review; a committee of this kind can so arrange the details that we can accomplish the work in a short time. Adopted.

By Mr. COOK:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this Convention 500 copies of the daily journal.

Mr. REDFIELD proposed to amend by inserting 1000. Amendment accepted and resolution adopted.

By Mr. COOK:

Resolved, That the daily sessions of the Convention shall commence at ten o'clock, A. M., until otherwise ordered.

Mr. BUSH would prefer meeting at nine.

Mr. COOK accepted the suggestion, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HASCALL offered a resolution that the members of the Convention go into a draft for their respective seats.

Mr. CLARK said there were a number of gentlemen of the Convention who should have seats, and cannot find any. How those gentlemen who had seats had obtained them, was a mystery to him. He thought it would be most proper to distribute them by draft.

Mr. HANSCOM said the law of the state provided against lotteries. He considered the proposition of the gentlemen from Kalamazoo a species of gambling to which he had most serious objections.

Mr. DIMOND asked for the ayes and noes, which were ordered, and the motion was negatived.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following:

Resolved, That the State Printer be instructed to forward, by mail, one copy of the daily journal to the publishers of each newspaper published in the state, during the session of the Convention.

Mr. B. said the object of the resolution was to get the proceedings of the convention placed in the hands of the people at as little expense as possible. The journals would be republished in the newspapers. The sending of journals by members was done at an expense of time which could be devoted to more useful purposes. Carried.

A resolution was offered requiring the Sergeant-at-Arms to furnish the members of the Convention with stationery.

Mr. EATON thought it would be like requiring a constable to pay the cost of a suit.

Mr. BUSH inquired if it was not required by provisions of law that the Secretary of State should furnish stationery to the members of the Convention.

The resolution was withdrawn.

Mr. STOREY offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to inquire into the propriety of procuring the services of three reporters to report the proceedings and debates of this Convention. Adopted.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Convention be instructed to procure papers equal to one daily paper for each delegate, of such papers as each delegate shall direct.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE raised the question, whether there was any provision made by law for the payment of those papers. He believed there was no such provision made by law for such payment, and if not, the Secretary could not draw on the treasury for the funds.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD believed the members of the Convention were entitled to all the privileges of members of the Legislature.

Mr. WITHERELL read the provision of the law in relation to the subject—it provides that the Convention may furnish for its own use such stationery as is necessary.

The resolution was not adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM offered a resolution that a committee of three be appointed to inquire what arrangements, if any, can be made in reference to postage.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to add that the committee further inquire into the propriety or means of furnishing newspapers to members.

The amendment was accepted and the resolution adopted.

Messrs. HANSCOM, DANFORTH and BRITAIN were appointed such committee.

Mr. CROUSE offered a resolution instructing the committee on rules to procure the rules which shall be adopted, to be printed, with the Constitution of the State, &c., and such information as is embraced in the manual of the Legislature of 1850.

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL, the resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the chair to furnish the members of the convention with stationery.

Mr. COOK moved to amend by adding not exceeding in value five dollars to each member.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the resolution and amendment were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, (2d day,) June 4.

The roll was called, the journal read and approved.

The PRESIDENT announced the following committees appointed under resolutions of yesterday:

Committee on resolution as to reporters—Messrs. STOREY, CHURCH and WELLS.

Committee on resolution as to mode of proceedings, &c.—Messrs. McCLELLAND, CRARY, S. CLARK, TIFFANY, WILLIAMS, R. ROBINSON, WHITTEMORE, WALKER and WITHERELL.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to invite the resident clergymen of this place to meet with us alternately, and open our daily sessions with devotional exercises.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to lay the resolution on the table, which motion did not prevail; and the question being on its adoption,

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG said, I offered this resolution, Mr. President, in the confident hope it would find a ready response in the bosom of every member of this Convention. The business which has assembled us here is of the most vital interest to the citizens of our State and to the permanency of our free institutions. On an occasion of this kind it appears to me, Mr. President, that we need pre-eminently, as your honor observed yesterday, the direction of that All-Wise Being who guides the destinies of States and of Nations. There are many upon this floor, sir, who would fear to enter upon the ordinary duties of life without first acknowledging their dependence, and seeking from on high that wisdom which is profitable to direct; much more, sir, in our present capacity, do we need to invoke the guidance of that All-Wise Being who not only orders the destinies of States and of Nations, but who notes all our conduct, and to whom we must soon render an account of our stewardship. I did hope, sir, in view of our high responsibilities and the vast importance of the business before us, this resolution would at least find no opposition in this intelligent body, and still trust upon sober reflection the votes of all its members will be recorded in its favor.

The resolution was then adopted, yeas 73, nays 16.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, the thanks of the Convention were tendered to Mr. BUSHNELL for his efficient services as Secretary pro tem.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS,

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to make arrangements for the raising of the national flag at the hour of the opening of the daily sessions of this Convention.

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL,

Resolved, That his Excellency, the Governor, be invited by the President to take a seat within the bar of the Convention during its session.

Mr. WELLS offered the following:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-arms be instructed not to allow strangers to come within the bar, except those introduced by members or officers of this Convention.

Mr. W. said he regretted exceedingly the necessity which called for the introduction of this resolution. He should wish the eyes of ten thousand of the people were resting on the Convention during the deliberation of its members, but the experience of yesterday showed the necessity for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HANSCOM said strangers were excluded from within the bar by the existing rules under which the Convention was acting.

Mr. WELLS—In that case I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WITHERELL would merely remark that the inconvenience to which members were subject yesterday arose from the natural curiosity of the public to witness the opening of the Convention. It had abated to-day, and would in a few days altogether cease.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee relative to reporters, &c., be instructed to inquire into the propriety of having the proceedings of the Convention published in the German language.

Mr. McC. said he offered it as a matter of inquiry. He had received a communication from the Germans themselves on the subject. We have, (said Mr. McC.,) a great many German emigrants in the country who do not understand the English language, who are desirous of becoming acquainted with the principles of our government and our political institutions. I propose to the committee to inquire into the expediency of the measure. If it should be found impracticable they must report against it.

Mr. REDFIELD hoped it would be submitted to the consideration of the committee. The German emigration was daily settling in our State. We are inviting them here and should give them every facility in our power for becoming acquainted with our institutions.

Mr. CRARY proposed to add, "and in the Dutch language."

Mr. WITHERELL would also add "French." The French inhabitants had occupied the soil for more than one hundred and fifty years, and were entitled to some consideration. It was not so much a question of expense as expediency. He moved to add "the French language," also.

Mr. McCLELLAND said he had discharged the duty imposed upon him by a part of his constituents. He had offered the proposition at their request. There was a respectable German paper published in the State, so that there would be no difficulty in getting the proceedings published in that language.

Mr. J. CLARK hoped the resolution would be adopted; it certainly could do no harm, as it was merely a resolution of inquiry. He knew there was a great interest felt among our German population to become acquainted with the machinery of our government; they apply to be naturalized and to become citizens. So long as they are desirous of acquiring information relative to our institutions and the principles of our government, it seems proper and necessary that an inquiry should be instituted relative to such information being communicated to them.

Mr. CRARY said as it was only a resolution of inquiry it would be only ordinary courtesy to adopt it. There were a great number of Dutch settled in the State. The gentleman from St. Clair seemed to think that they spoke the same language as the German, but that was not the case. He should also support the amendment to include the French language.

Mr. BAGG was in favor of the original resolution, as amended by the gentleman from Calhoun, and opposed to the other amendments. So far as he was acquainted with the French population along the Detroit river, all those that can read, understand the English language. The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE called up the resolution offered yesterday by Mr. WHITMORE, that a committee of three be appointed to furnish for the use of the Convention, such stationery as is allowed by law.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend by adding "and to the officers of the Convention such stationery as they may require," which was accepted.

Mr. CRARY moved to add: "provided the allowance to each member do not exceed the sum of five dollars."

Mr. C. said he offered the amendment because the allowance by law was unlimited. He believed and knew from his own experience that stationery to the amount, in value, of five dollars would be amply sufficient for each member.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out "five," and insert "three." The question was taken on striking out and lost.

Mr. HANSCOM thought it unnecessary to appoint a special committee for the purpose. The standing committee on supplies would soon be appointed. He moved to lay on the table. Lost.

The amendment offered by Mr. CRARY prevailed.

Mr. STOREY moved to strike out "a committee of three," and insert "the committee on supplies;" and the resolution so amended was adopted.

Mr. CORNELL offered a resolution requiring the Secretary of State to furnish copies of the Constitutions of certain specified States for the use of the Convention. The Constitutions of other States were proposed to be added, by different members.

Mr. C. thought it of importance that copies of the Constitution of those States should be accessible to members for the use of the Convention. He had inquired of the Secretary of State, and no provision had been made for it by the last Legislature.

Mr. COOK moved to amend by directing the Secretary of State to cause the Constitutions of those States to be printed for the use of the Convention.

Mr. WALKER thought that proposition would not facilitate the progress of the Convention in revising the Constitution of Michigan. He hoped the Constitution would be revised and that he should be at home before, by any possibility, the printing of those Constitutions could be effected.

Mr. REDFIELD was of opinion that copies sufficient for the use of the Convention might be obtained from individuals. He was opposed to any unnecessary expense or delay.

Mr. CORNELL believed a sufficient number of copies might be obtained from the State Library and from individuals without expense.

Mr. STOREY thought if anything of this kind was necessary, it would be better to send to New York. A work had been published which contains all those constitutions.

Mr. CORNELL said his object had been in part accomplished by calling the attention of the Convention to the subject. He asked to withdraw the resolution, which was granted.

Mr. STOREY offered a resolution that the Secretary of State be instructed to procure — copies of a work containing the Constitutions of the several States for the use of the Convention.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to fill the blank with 10.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to insert 20.

Mr. BAGG moved to insert 100. He thought every member of the Convention should be in possession of as much information in relation to those subjects as the committees, or they would not be fully prepared to act upon the reports of those committees.

Mr. EATON inquired how they were to be paid for; if the money was to come out of the appropriation to members for stationery, he had no objection to the largest number.

Mr. CROUSE said it was immaterial to him whether the blank was filled with twenty or one hundred. He was opposed to and should vote against the resolution in any shape. We, (said Mr. C.) as a people, have a very good constitution; it wants but few amendments, and those amendments are indicated to us by the wishes of the people. The people know what they want, and the amendments they require are but few. It is of little importance to us what constitutions the States of Kentucky or Mississippi, or California may have; they may be adapted to their wants, or the habits and character of their people, but would probably be unsuitable to the habits and character of our people. We are not sent here to telegraph from one end of the Union to the other, from Maine to California, for constitutions upon which to model our own, but to make those few amendments to our excellent constitution which the people require. I am desirous, (said Mr. C.,) to save time by coming to a direct vote on the question.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to add that the copies at the end of the session be deposited in the State Library.

Mr. FRALICK moved that the resolution and proposed amendments be laid on the table, which prevailed.

The PRESIDENT announced a communication from the Secretary of State, in relation to the expenses of the Circuit Courts and the expenses of the County Courts in the several counties of the State, which had been ordered by resolution of the last Legislature.

Five hundred copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. KINGSLEY, from the committee appointed to prepare rules, reported.

The report was ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR announced the appointment of a Door-keeper and Messengers.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (3d day,) June 5.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY.

The roll called. Journal read and corrected.

REPORTS.

Mr. McCLELLAND, from the committee appointed to report as to the best mode of proceeding to the revision of the Constitution of the State, reported.

Mr. McC. said the committee had arranged the subjects for the consideration of the committees, in conformity with the present Constitution of the State. In all cases where they could do so, they had divided the subjects for consideration so as to avoid any conflicting of the duties of one committee with those of another. They proposed the appointment of twenty-two committees, as follows:

A committee of seven on the Bill of Rights; of five on the Elective Franchise; of five on the Division of the Powers of Government; of nine on the Legislative Department; of nine on the Executive Department; of nine on the Judiciary Department; of five on State Officers, except the Executive; of seven on County Officers and County Government; of seven on Township Officers and the government of Townships; of five on the Organization and Government of Cities and Villages; of five on Impeachment and Removals from office; of seven on the Militia; of nine on Education; of nine on Finance and Taxation; of nine on banking, and corporations other than municipal; of seven on Salaries; of five on the Seat of Government; of seven on Exemptions, Real and Personal, and the Rights of Married Women; of seven on the Punishment of Crimes; of seven on Miscellaneous Provisions; of five on the Mode of Amending and Revising the Constitution; of seven on the Schedule; of eleven on the Arrangement and Phraseology of the Constitution.

It was proposed that the committee on Education should take under their consideration all that belongs to the University of the State, Common Schools, &c.

The report was laid on the table.

Mr. STOREY, from the committee to inquire into the propriety of securing the services of three Reporters to report the proceedings and debates of this Convention, reported, and recommended the adoption of a resolution appointing C. J. Fox, of

Adrian, J. COATES, of Oakland county, and WILLIAM COATES, of Pontiac, Reporters of the Convention, with a per diem allowance of three dollars each. Also the following resolutions:

Resolved, That there be printed in octavo form, in bourgeois type, for the use of the members of this Convention, one thousand copies of the proceedings and debates, as furnished by the Reporters; such proceedings and debates to be delivered to the members in sheets as fast as printed.

Resolved, That there be printed in book form, upon the same type used in printing the sheets provided for in the foregoing resolution, (without any extra pay for composition,) one thousand copies of the proceedings and debates of this Convention; and that such books be bound in leather, and distributed as follows, to wit: One copy to be transmitted to the Secretary of State of the United States; one copy to the library of Congress; one copy to the Secretaries of State of each of the States and Territories in the Union; one copy to each of the State Institutions in this State; one copy to each of the Judges of a court of record in this State; one copy to each of the members and officers of this Convention; one copy to each of the town clerks in this State, to be deposited in the town Libraries; ten copies to be deposited in the State Library, and one copy in each of the State offices; and the remainder to be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State for transmission to the town clerks of such new towns as may be hereafter organized.

Resolved, That the printing provided for in the foregoing resolutions shall be done under the supervision of the committee on printing.

The report was accepted and the committee discharged.

On the question of concurring in the report,

Mr. DANFORTH moved that the report be printed.

Mr. COOK observed that not only the reporting of the proceedings and debates of the Convention was embraced in the resolutions, but also the mode of printing, and the distribution of the copies. He was not prepared to vote on it at present. He had no objection to action on the first resolution, relative to the Reporters, if the vote could be taken separately.

The report was laid on the table, and the Convention went into committee of the whole on the report on the rules reported yesterday by Mr. KINGSLEY, Mr. HANSCOM in the chair.

PROCEEDINGS IN COMMITTEE.

The question was taken on the adoption of the rules separately.

Rule 8 provides that no member shall speak more than twice on the same question, without leave of the Convention, nor more than once until every member who chooses to speak shall have spoken.

Mr. BARTOW, of Genesee, proposed an amendment, to add not more than one hour.

Mr. CRARY proposed fifteen minutes as the limitation.

Mr. WALKER opposed the amendment. Some limitation might be of use in legislatures, but the questions which would come before the Convention were of such importance that though he did not suppose any member would be disposed to exceed the time proposed by the gentleman from Genesee, yet he thought there would be an impropriety in cutting off debate.

Mr. BARTOW had proposed the amendment in view of another rule, which provides for unlimited debate in committee of the whole, which would admit enough of discussion. If, as the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] had supposed, no member would be likely to exceed the time which the proposed amendment allowed, the amendment could do no harm. He thought the limitation proper, and that there would be an impropriety in any gentleman obtruding himself upon the Convention for a greater length of time.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG concurred in the views entertained by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER.] He apprehended no gentleman on that floor would abuse his privilege. Some men (said Mr. Van V.) have matured their minds more than others, and we want their information.

Mr. KINGSLEY said the question had been considered in committee. He was not disposed to shorten the time at present. After full discussion of the various subjects which would come under the consideration of the Convention, if such a rule should be found necessary, it might be adopted. Some gentlemen could express their opinions in less time than others, and every gentleman should have the opportunity of stating his opinions.

Mr. GOODWIN proposed 30 minutes as the limitation.

Mr. CRARY accepted that proposition to his amendment. Mr. C. said this is a business body, a deliberative body. We can come here and occupy hours in talking about first principles, but that is not what the people want; we are here to supply what the people want in the Constitution. If we limit ourselves to that object we need not occupy more than fifteen minutes on any one occasion, in speaking; but if we are here to discuss constitutional law we can speak for hours. I (said Mr. C.) came here for no such purpose, but I wish to aid in embodying the amendments the people want in the Constitution, and then go home.

Mr. BARTOW accepted the amendment to his amendment.

Mr. WALKER renewed the original proposition of one hour. He would have preferred leaving debate unlimited, at least at present. Perhaps all the members had not come so instructed, as the gentleman [Mr. C.] from Calhoun. The people of Macomb had instructed their delegates on some subjects, but not on all subjects that would come under the consideration of the Convention. I believe (said Mr. W.) that our constituents require us to discuss principles and consider some subjects which they have not instructed us upon.

Mr. BUSH said: Mr. Chairman, I do not see the necessity for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Genesee, or for any amendment to the rule reported by the committee. I have had considerable experience in legislation, and I do not recollect ever listening for one hour to one speech from any gentleman in our legislative halls. In the House of Representatives, the rule always stood as reported by the committee of this Convention, till every principle involved in the various subjects of legislation had been fully discussed; till all business before the House had been perfected, and new matter excluded. After that period had arrived, it was customary to limit debate; and till that time arrives in the course of our deliberation on the important subjects we are sent here to investigate and discuss, I should not think it expedient to limit debate. I do not think any gentleman here is disposed to bore the House with long speeches. If there are any here with such a predisposition, the unhappy propensity will soon be corrected in an assembly like this. We are assembled in Convention to revise the organic law of the land, and it is proper to discuss the principles on which we are called to act; then why limit the time in the outset, for this discussion? I trust, sir, the rule as reported by the committee will be adopted without amendment.

The question was taken, and both the amendments negatived.

The committee rose and reported back to the Convention the rules and amendments, which were concurred in, with the exception of the amendment to the 23d rule.

Mr. WALKER offered a substitute for 23d rule.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to lay the original and substitute on the table. Carried.

Mr. J. CLARK called up the report of the committee, as to mode of proceeding, &c.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE proposed to amend by combining the committee on township officers and the committee on county officers and county government. The business of those two committees was so much alike that they might with propriety be combined.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The committee on counties is one of much importance. The two committees may combine the result of their deliberations.

The motion did not prevail.

The report was then adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM, from committee appointed to inquire what arrangement can be made in reference to postage and newspapers, reported, that upon conferring with his Excellency, the Governor, they learned that there was, by an act of the last legislature, placed in his hands, as a part of the contingent fund, the sum of five hundred dollars, for the purpose of employing or retaining a private secretary until after the close of this Convention. That he had dispensed with the services of a private secretary, and consequently the sum of $500, designed for payment for the services of such officer, was now in the contingent fund, and that he would use such sum for the payment of such postage as might be directed by the Convention.

The committee would further beg leave to state, that under the construction given to the law under which the Convention is organized, by the Auditor General, that officer would not feel himself authorized to draw a warrant upon the Treasurer upon the certificate of the Secretary and President of the Convention, for postage or other contingent expenses, other than those specially contemplated by the terms of the act.

Upon the subject of newspapers, the committee have been informed by the proprietors of the Detroit Free Press, and the Advertiser, that they will furnish such papers as the Convention may direct, under the recommendation of the Convention to the next Legislature to make an appropriation to pay for the same.

It is perhaps proper, in conclusion, to state that at the time of the appropriation to the contingent fund above referred to, the Governor had in his employ as private secretary, Mr. HORACE S. ROBERTS, a gentleman eminently qualified for the performance of the duties, and whose services were only dispensed with from considerations of economy; the Governor preferring to perform his own appropriate duties, and also those devolving upon that officer, rather than impose additional burthens upon the treasury. All which is respectfully submitted.

The report was accepted, the committee discharged and the report laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the first resolution relative to reporters of the Convention was taken from the table and the same was adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following resolution, and the same was agreed to:

Resolved, That there be added to the standing committees of the Convention, one on supplies and expenditures, to consist of five members.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the subject of postage and newspapers was referred to the committee on supplies and expenditures.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, the Convention then adjourned.

THURSDAY, (4th day,) June 6.

The Convention was called to order at 9 o'clock.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SAPP.

On motion of Mr. LEACH, the reading of the journal was dispensed with.

Mr. BRITAIN rose to inquire if the rule requiring the proceedings in committee of the whole to be entered on the journal had been adopted.

The PRESIDENT remarked that the rule had not yet been adopted.

REPORTS.

Mr. HANSCOM presented the following:

The committee on supplies and expenditures recommend to the Convention the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee on supplies and expenditures be and they are hereby authorized and required to procure for the use of the Convention an amount of such stationery as will be required, not exceeding in value three hundred dollars, and that the same be delivered to the respective members and officers, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Convention; and an account kept of the amount delivered to each member and officer of the Convention; and that if, after the adjournment of the Convention, any portion of the same should be unappropriated, the same shall be delivered by the Secretary of the Convention to the Secretary of State for the use of the State.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Convention be required to order for the members of this Convention such newspapers as they may direct, not exceeding two dailies for each, during the setting of the Convention, and that this Convention recommend that the next Legislature make an appropriation to pay therefor.

Resolved, That all postage on mailable matter (not exceeding the sum of five hundred dollars) received or sent, except letters sent by members of the Convention, be, by the Post Master of this village, charged to the Convention; and that his Excellency, the Governor, be and is hereby requested to pay such sum to said Post Master, upon the certificate of the Secretary of the Convention, countersigned by the President, as may be due for postage, not exceeding said sum of $500; and that the Post Master be required to keep an account with each member of the Convention.

The report was accepted, the committee discharged and the resolutions laid on the table.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG, from the committee appointed to invite resident clergymen to officiate at the opening of the daily session of the Convention, reported that they had performed that duty; and the committee was discharged.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. GARDINER offered the following:

Resolved, That a standing committee of five be appointed to superintend the printing to be done for this Convention, to be called the committee on printing.

Mr. COOK inquired what printing it is intended to superintend.

Mr. HASCALL—Reports of committees and such printing as the Convention may order.

The resolution was adopted, and the President appointed Messrs. GARDINER, HASCALL, CHURCH, ROBERTS and BUSH such committee.

Mr. STOREY offered the following:

Resolved, That the State Printer be instructed to print an edition of 250 copies of the daily official journal of this Convention, in book form, for binding; and that he be instructed to print a like number of all reports of committees for binding.

Resolved, That the contractor for doing the binding for the State, be instructed to bind in the same manner the journals of the Legislature are now bound, the journals and such documents as may be printed by order of this Convention, in one volume—the reports to be inserted as an appendix to the journals.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG asked what disposition was to be made of these books.

Mr. STOREY remarked that it was intended to distribute them in the same manner as journals of Legislature. The copies remaining after members of the Convention had been supplied could be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

Mr. BRITAIN thought it was a standing rule of the Convention, that every member, previous to speaking, should address himself to the President; he had risen several times, but had been unable to get the attention of the President, as members had taken the floor and gone on to speak without addressing the President. He moved that the resolutions be referred to the committee on printing.

The motion of Mr. BRITAIN was carried.

Mr. ARZENO offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a certificate of five dollars be drawn and presented to each member of this Convention, to be used by such member in the purchase of stationery.

Mr. CRARY said the object embraced in this resolution would come up under the report of the committee on supplies and expenditures. He moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. ROBERTS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee on governmental and judicial policy of the Upper Peninsular, be added to the standing committees, to consist of nine members. Adopted.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved that the vote by which the 34th rule was stricken from the report of the committee on rules to govern this Convention, be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT suggested that the subject would come up to-day, when the report of the committee on rules was taken from the table.

Mr. CORNELL moved to lay the resolution on the table. Carried.

Mr. BUSH moved to take from the table the report of the committee on supplies and expenditures. He considered it very important that the resolutions should be adopted. Members of the Convention were without stationery, and it was necessary they should be supplied. The report was taken up.

Mr. HANSCOM asked that the resolutions be acted upon separately.

The first resolution being under consideration,

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG presented the following (resolution offered by Mr. ARZENO and laid on the table,) as a substitute:

Resolved, That a certificate for five dollars be drawn and presented to each member of this Convention, to be used by such member in the purchase of stationery.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the resolution of the committee would be adopted. The system proposed in the resolution just offered would operate unequally and unjustly. The relative position of the members made it necessary that some should have five, some ten and others twenty dollars worth of stationery, while many could pocket the five dollars proposed to be given by the resolution. He knew not that there were such in this body, but there had been in the Legislature. He knew how the system worked in the Legislature last winter; some members of committees were compelled to pay from ten to twelve dollars out of their own pockets, when others saved money. The resolution of the committee was equal and just—it was more economical. It proposed only three hundred dollars, and this five hundred. He thought the resolution recommended by the committee embraced the better system, and hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG preferred that each member should have control over his own stationery. He considered the plan proposed by this resolution much more economical and just, than that by the committee. Let their plan be adopted, and members would soon hear the stationery had all been exhausted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend by striking out the word "five," and inserting "three."

A division of the question being called, the question was first taken on striking out, and the same prevailed. The blank was then filled with "three."

Mr. CROUSE would barely observe, from experience, he would much prefer the resolution offered in the report of the committee. He did not like the plan of running to this shop and that, for the purpose of buying a small quantity of stationery. It was paying too dear for the whistle. The committee could purchase more with three hundred dollars, than could be bought with five hundred, as proposed by the substitute.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON, the substitute was so amended as to appropriate two dollars, in addition, to the chairman of each standing committee, for the use of the committee.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped the resolution would not prevail. He would call attention to a resolution already adopted, by which members were to be furnished with stationery to an amount not exceeding five dollars each. [The reading of the resolution adopted being asked, it was read by the Secretary.] He thought the resolution would also conflict with the report of the committee. The substitute ought not to prevail unless the resolution already adopted be repealed.

Mr. S. CLARK was opposed to the substitute and in favor of the resolution reported by the committee. The amount suggested by the committee was much more economical, and by the plan proposed, the necessary supplies would be distributed as the various wants of members required.

Mr. REDFIELD concurred with the report of the committee. It was of little matter in what manner the supplies were distributed. Let every member receive what was actually necessary.

The reading of the resolution reported by the committee being asked, it was read by the President.

Mr. WITHERELL was more in favor of the resolution than the substitute. If this body could appropriate three dollars, it could three hundred. The design was to give members supplies, not money. He preferred the original resolution, as by it each member might obtain what he wanted. He did not like the plan of appropriating money.

Mr. HANSCOM considered the substitute void, if adopted—no warrant would issue. The resolution of the committee followed the law and was a saving to the state. He was opposed to members huckstering about the streets like schoolboys trading in marbles.

Mr. WALKER asked if there were any restrictions in the resolution of the committee, to prevent ten or fifteen members from drawing the whole amount of stationery. He believed there were none.

Mr. HANSCOM would answer the gentlemen from Macomb. There was nothing to prevent stealing. The committee regarded the members of the Convention as honorable men, and considered the open account proposed to be kept with the Secretary a sufficient restriction. If any gentleman was disposed to rob that officer, there was nothing in the resolution to prevent him.

Mr. WALKER thought the Secretary should have some check on members. Experience said it was proper.

Mr. BAGG did not believe the constitution would suffer by the manner in which stationery was distributed. He would not dictate to any member whether he should buy gilt-edged paper or fools-cap; common goose-quills or gold pens,—let every gentleman get just what he wanted. He preferred the money to purchase what he considered necessary, and was therefore opposed to the original resolution, and in favor of the substitute.

The substitute as amended was again read.

Mr. BRITAIN was of the opinion that the state would be put to too much expense if the resolution prevailed. The convention had already adopted a resolution requiring the "committee on supplies to furnish for the use of this Convention such stationery as is allowed by law, not exceeding five dollars to each member, and to each officer so much as he shall require;" and if this resolution be adopted, the amount appropriated by it would be in addition to the amount already appropriated.

He was opposed to the resolution for another reason. It proposed to appropriate money, not stationery; and this Convention had no constitutional right to appropriate money to its members, to be by them either paid out for stationery, or placed in their pockets to be used for other purposes, at their option.

The system of drawing money, instead of supplies, was urged by many members of the last legislature and adopted. He was familiar with the workings of the plan then, and did not like it. It would be much better for each member to furnish himself with stationery, and present an account therefor before drawing the money, or a certificate therefor.

Mr. N. PIERCE disagreed with the gentleman. He did not see what they had to do with the constitution—they were not subject to it. The members of the legislature last winter were subject to constitutional rule, and took the constitutional oath. Members of the Convention were under no such rule—they were not sworn to anything. The legislature could draw for what they wanted in money, or in any way they choose.

He thought the gentleman had erred in his reasoning. It appeared to him the Convention, if it thought proper, had a right to appropriate a sum of money to buy stationery. He saw nothing to hinder it.

Mr. BRITAIN supposed the Convention was subject to the Constitution. The only law under which it was called, was passed in accordance with constitutional provisions. The only law under which the Convention can furnish its members with stationery, was that under which the Convention was called, which provided that "the said Convention may furnish for its own use, such stationery as it may require, as is usual for Legislative bodies; and the amount due therefor shall be certified to, and paid for in the same manner as the delegates and officers are paid."

Under this law the Convention can only appropriate the money after it shall have become due for stationery, previously purchased; and under the constitution, which the Treasurer has sworn to support, no money could be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. It must therefore, he thought, be evident that the Convention is subject to the constitution in this respect, and that it has no right to appropriate money to its own members, to be used by them as they may think proper.

The question was taken on the substitute as amended, and lost.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following as a substitute for the first resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Convention be instructed to purchase five hundred dollars worth of stationery for the use of the Convention, and that the Secretary distribute to the members not exceeding three dollars worth each, and such stationery as their official duties may require to the chairmen of standing committees.

Mr. MORRISON moved to strike out "three" and insert "two," in the substitute. Lost.

The question being taken on the adoption of the substitute, as offered by Mr. BUTTERFIELD, it was not carried.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the first resolution reported by the committee,

On motion of Mr. MASON, all after the word "resolved" was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, the remainder of the resolution was laid on the table.

The second resolution being under consideration,

Mr. HASCALL moved to strike out the word "two," and insert "one."

A division of the question was called for, and the Convention refused to strike out.

Mr. Leach moved to strike out all after the word "resolved;" which motion was lost; and the second resolution was adopted.

The third resolution being under consideration,

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the last clause of the resolution, relative to the Post Master keeping an account with delegates, &c., was stricken out.

Mr. MASON moved to lay the resolution on the table. Lost.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the Post Master at Lansing be and he is hereby authorized to charge to the State the postage on all mail matter received by members and officers of said Convention, and all journals and documents of said Convention sent from this post office by said members and officers; provided said amount do not exceed five hundred dollars.

His object was to confine the payment to that description of mail matter necessary to the people. The substitute also proposed to pay the postage on documents—not on newspapers. He did not wish to incur expense by sending useless matter throughout the State. The postage bill of the last Legislature amounted to eighteen hundred and forty dollars.

Mr. CORNELL would like to hear the resolution reported by the committee, and the substitute read. [They were read.] He saw no difference in them.

Mr. BRITAIN—Under the resolution, the postage on all newspapers sent off by members would have to be paid. The substitute proposes to pay only for journals and documents sent from this office. Members could not send newspapers.

Mr. CORNELL—Suppose a member should envelope a newspaper with a journal, how would the Post Master find it out and get his pay?

Mr. BRITAIN—It is the duty of the Post Master to detect that fraud.

Mr. CORNELL knew there were some cunning fellows in the Convention, and it would be hard for the Post Master to find out their tricks.

The question being taken on the substitute, it was lost, and the resolution adopted.

RULES.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the report of the committee on rules was taken from the table.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the adoption of the substitute of Mr. WALKER to the 23d rule.

Mr. COOK suggested to the gentleman [Mr. WALKER] to strike out the words "without a vote of two-thirds." That number could suspend the rules and reconsider at any time.

The substitute was modified as proposed, and the words stricken out by general consent.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the substitute by striking out the two first lines, as printed, and inserting:

"A motion for reconsideration shall be in order at any time, and may be made by any member of the Convention; but if the motion to reconsider shall not be made on the same day or the day after that on which the decision proposed to be reconsidered was made, three days' notice of the intention to make the motion shall be given."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE much preferred the 19th rule of the last Convention, and requested the Secretary to read it. [It was read.]

The motion to amend was not carried; and the question being taken on the substitute it was lost—yeas 33, nays 53.

Mr. MORRISON offered the following as a substitute:

"When a motion has been once put, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member who voted in the majority to move for a reconsideration thereof, on the same or the succeeding day. And it shall be in order for any member thereafter to make such motion, by giving at least two days' notice of his intention to do so. But a motion for reconsideration being put and lost, shall not be a second time renewed without a vote of a majority of the members elect." Lost.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE offered the following as a substitute:

"No motion for reconsideration shall be in order unless on the same day or day following that on which the decision proposed to be reconsidered took place, nor unless one of the majority shall move such reconsideration. A motion for reconsideration being put and lost, shall not be resumed, nor shall any subject be a second time reconsidered without the consent of the Convention." Lost.

The Convention then concurred in the report of the committee of the whole regarding the 23d rule.

The question being upon the adoption of the rules as concurred in,

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to amend the 8th rule by adding after the word "question," the words "nor more than one hour at any one time."

Mr. B. regarded the rule as a good one. The President might not be called on to enforce it, yet it would give notice to members, and lead to a condensation of remarks. He hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend the amendment by striking out "one hour," and inserting "fifteen minutes."

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the motion of the gentleman from Genesee [Mr. BARTOW] would prevail. He did not propose to consume much time of the Convention either in long or short speeches, but if he did desire to say anything, he wished to express his ideas fully or not at all. Though it may be proper to put a legislative body in a strait jacket, he did not deem it necessary to impose stringent rules upon a body like this, whose duty it is to revise the fundamental laws, and whose business is the discussion of principles.

Though some men may condense all their ideas into a speech of fifteen minutes, yet there are others in the Convention who may be able to enlighten it for an hour. We here represent society resolved into its original elements, thrown back into a state of chaos; and he did not think the limitations which the abuses of legislative bodies had rendered necessary, exactly applicable to us. He would allow all members as wide a latitude in discussion as is reasonable and safe. The limitation proposed of fifteen minutes, is too rigid—thirty minutes might be long enough, but still he hoped the amendment to the rule proposed by the gentleman from Genesee, limiting each speaker to an hour, would be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was not carried.

Mr. DESNOYERS moved to strike out "one hour," and insert "thirty minutes;" and a division of the question being called for, the Convention refused to strike out. The amendment offered by Mr. BARTOW was then adopted.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to amend the 35th rule by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty." His object in proposing the amendment was this: By the rule as it now stood, ten members could check the proceedings of the Convention, and he was unwilling to place this power in the hands of ten persons. If reference were made to the journals of our own legislature, it would be seen how often the power had been abused.

Mr. BRITAIN had no objection to the amendment. He supposed the gentleman [Mr. P.] had reference to himself, when alluding to the calling of the ayes and noes on this floor. He had called for them twice, but he considered the subjects embraced in the resolutions, when the votes were taken, of importance. The committee, before reporting, had considered the matter maturely, and thought one-tenth ought to have the power.

Mr. WITHERELL hoped the amendment would prevail. He was in that House last March, and saw the impropriety of giving the power to a small number. The majority, for hours, were prevented from proceeding in business. First, there was a motion to lay on the table; then the ayes and noes were called—next a motion to adjourn, and the ayes and noes again called, and so on, until the minority thought proper to yield. At least one-fifth of the members should be necessary to make the call.

Mr. KINGSLEY would remark that the proceeding to which the gentleman [Mr. W.] had alluded, arose under the very rule the amendment proposed, and which he wished adopted.

The vote was taken on the amendment and lost.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, the 28th rule was amended by inserting after the words "ministers of the gospel," the words "ladies, farmers, mechanics, laborers and other citizens and strangers."

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out the rule, (28th.) Carried.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the Convention concurred in the report of the committee of the whole, striking out the 34th rule.

Mr. P. had no preference for the manual mentioned in the rule. He only wished the Convention to adopt some guide. If any gentleman would suggest one more suitable, he would go for it.

Mr. WHIPPLE did not see the importance of engrafting this rule among those by which the Convention would be governed, for the obvious reason that many of the rules, as laid down in Jefferson's Manual, had been altered. The President was doubtless familiar with the general principles of the parliamentary law, and in the proceedings of the Convention he would enforce them.

Mr. CRARY was not aware that the parliamentary law of Mr. Jefferson had fallen into such disrepute. Some few rules, as laid down by Mr. Jefferson, had been altered, but in Congress they were regarded as high authority. He was in favor of his colleague's amendment, making Jefferson's Manual our guide.

Mr. McLEOD was one of those who had great respect for an old rule, well understood, although it might be a bad one. The rules of parliamentary practice, as comprised in Mr. Jefferson's Manual, had been a custom, to the contrary of which the memory of man runneth not. The House, in the Legislature in this State in '33 or '34, thought proper to adopt it as a guide, and it had continued such up to this time. It was much better to adopt some particular practice, as different members might have in their pockets the manual of Mr. Jefferson, of Mr. Sutherland, and of Tom, Dick and Harry. Many principles had been settled by Mr. Jefferson, and if any doubt should arise as to the practice in some particular cases, they could get the advice of his friend from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] who was familiar with parliamentary practice and would decide for them.

The question arising on concurring in the amendment, the Convention refused to concur.

Mr. BUSH offered the following as a substitute for the 2d rule:

"Upon the appearance of a quorum, the journal of the preceding day shall be corrected, and, when demanded by a majority, shall be read by the Secretary."

Mr. B. knew the custom of reading the journal of proceedings on the day following had existed for a long time, and continued to exist. It originated from the necessity of the case; but on occasions like this, each member would read and examine for himself, and thus save much time.

Mr. WITHERELL thought a less number than a majority might request the reading of the journal, but he would make no motion.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG moved to amend the substitute by striking out "majority," and inserting the word "member."

Which motion did not prevail, and the substitute was adopted.

The rules as amended were then adopted in gross.

Mr. HASCALL inquired if the clergymen, who had been invited to open the daily sessions with prayer, were officers of the Convention, and what arrangement had been made with them. He thought one chaplain sufficient. He did not wish the next Legislature to be troubled with any bills for services; and for the purpose of testing the question, moved a reconsideration of the resolution, appointing a committee to invite the clergymen of Lansing to open the morning sessions of the Convention with prayer, passed yesterday.

On motion of Mr. COOK,
The Convention adjourned.

Mr. KINGSLEY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on printing procure in convenient form, for the use of each member of this Convention, a copy of the present constitution of the State.

Mr. K. said, before the question was taken, he would state the object he had in view. Members of the Convention had not the old constitution before them. True; it is ordered to be printed in the manual, but it will be some time before the manual will be arranged and printed; and even in that form, it will be inconvenient for the use of the members. He proposed that it should be printed on foolscap paper, (one side printed, the other blank,) as the most convenient form for the use of members.

Mr. N. PIERCE would suggest to the mover of the resolution, the propriety of having the constitution printed in bill form, as most likely to secure the object the gentleman proposed.

Mr. KINGSLEY believed the form he had proposed would be found the most convenient. Adopted.

Mr. N. PIERCE offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on supplies and expenditures be instructed to employ some suitable person to repair the locks that are upon the tables of the members of this Convention, or so many of them as are not in repair.

Mr. COOK believed arrangements had been made by the Secretary of State for those repairs, which would be made as soon as locks could be procured.

Mr. McLEOD—The resolution could do no injury. It would have been better, and it would have shown more attention on the part of the State officers, if they had attended to this matter before the Convention met.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered the following:

Resolved, That the present constitution be referred to the appropriate committees, and that said committees be requested, when they report, to embody their suggestions for a constitution in articles and sections; that they copy into such articles sections of the present constitution applicable thereto, to which they propose no amendments or alterations, and in such sections as they propose to amend and alter, they shall incorporate such amendments and alterations.

Mr. McC. said the object he had in view was, so far as practicable, to produce uniformity in the mode of reporting the amendments.

If the alterations proposed are arranged and drawn up in connection with the parts proposed to be amended, every member can compare and decide more promptly on the amendment, than if he had to refer to another document.

Mr. REDFIELD—The object is merely to preserve the present excellent form of our constitution, so that when the committees report, the several parts may be placed together in harmony. The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WITHERELL rose and stated that he did not shun any labor in connection with the Convention. He declined to serve in the place proposed by the President on the committee on the punishment of crime.

Mr. N. PIERCE offered the following:

Resolved, That this Convention will on Monday next proceed to revise and amend the constitution of this State; that this Convention will resolve itself into the committee of the whole Convention, and take the present constitution up by articles and by sections, and in such other sub-divisions as will best suit the convenience of the committee, and proceed from day to day to revise and amend said constitution, in committee and in Convention, until the labors of this Convention shall be finished.

Mr. WHIPPLE—The resolution proposed by the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] would be in conflict with the resolution just adopted, and would embarrass exceedingly the business of the Convention. After the committees which have been appointed, under the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Monroe, shall have reported, then the Convention may with propriety go into committee of the whole on the constitution, under some such resolution as the gentleman proposes. To go at present into committee of the whole, would bring the Convention into direct conflict with the committees.

Mr. N. PIERCE thought it was obvious to every member of the Convention, that one of the main difficulties in doing business in Legislative bodies was in getting ready to do business. It is generally thirty days after the Legislature meets that the business of the session fairly commences. One week had been spent in organizing the Convention. The committees were now appointed, but it might be four weeks before they reported, during which time the members of the Convention not engaged on those committees would have nothing to do but walk the streets of Lansing. It appeared to him that the most proper mode of proceeding would be to take up the old constitution, and every man propose the amendment he wished to make. He thought the business would sooner be completed by the adoption of this mode, than by referring the several subjects embraced in the constitution to the committees. It would be found more difficult to connect the different parts reported by the committees, than by taking up the whole at once.

The object for which the Convention had assembled was to amend. The old constitution was a good one. If any alterations were required in the constitution, they were such as would tend to effect a reduction in the expenses of the government and the mode and manner of footing up the bills. It was desirable to accomplish this work in the least possible time; and as he believed the plan of proceeding he proposed would effect a saving of time, he had been induced to offer the resolution to the consideration of the Convention. It had been a long established custom in Legislative bodies and in conventions, to refer to committees and get their reports; but we live in a day of improvement—great improvement—and old established usages are not held in so much reverence as formerly. It appeared to him that there might be no impropriety in deviating from the ancient practice, by taking up at once the whole constitution itself. If difficulties should arise on any particular subject, it might be referred to a committee for more special consideration. Perhaps he was wrong in his calculation, but it appeared to him that in thirty days all the amendments required in the constitution might be made, and the revision completed.

Mr. WITHERELL—The object of the gentleman is accomplished already. The constitution is referred to the several committees under the different heads. The only difficulty seems to be that the gentleman wants something to do—something to talk about. It is probable that some of the committees will report back the subjects referred to them, without proposing any change, and that they will report immediately. The time of the Convention may then be occupied until the committees engaged on those subjects in which important alterations are contemplated, may be able to report.

Mr. BACKUS had come into the Convention with the disposition to accomplish the work for which they were assembled as speedily as possible. The main object for which the delegates were assembled, was to revise the constitution, and incorporate such amendments as were required by the people. A large proportion of that instrument was such as the people were perfectly satisfied with, and would require no alteration. In his view, some such mode as the gentleman proposed would have been appropriate, and might have been made applicable; but as the various subjects had been distributed among the several committees for their consideration, upon which they would be required to report, the adoption of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Calhoun would impede materially the business as arranged. The object of the gentleman might be accomplished by the introduction of resolutions instructing those committees to embody specific amendments in their reports. Gentlemen could indicate all the various modes of amendment they thought proper, and in that way call the attention of the committees to them. Had the whole constitution been referred to the committee of the whole in the first instance, it might have been proper; but he [Mr. B.] should hesitate to adopt the proposition now, after the Convention had appointed 23 committees to act and report on the matter.

The resolution was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the resolution relative to the printing of the reports of the proceedings of the Convention was taken from the table and referred to the committee on printing.

Mr. MOORE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the duty of inviting the resident clergy to officiate at the opening of the daily sessions, be instructed to report what arrangement has been made, if any, for the payment of their services.

Mr. M. said he offered the resolution, not with the intention of exciting any feeling amongst the members, but that some arrangement might be made, either among the members themselves or by some other mode, for the payment of the clergymen who had been invited to open the morning sessions of the Convention with prayer. Arrangements made now might prevent trouble hereafter.

Mr. McLEOD—We have no such committee in existence.

Mr. RAYNALE—The committee has been discharged, having reported that they had accomplished the object for which they had been appointed.

Mr. RAYNALE offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to invite the resident clergy of this village to attend alternately and open the sessions with prayer; and that no other compensation be allowed for the services of clergymen than the members of the Convention may deem proper to pay from their own private funds.

Mr. MOORE withdrew his resolution, and Mr. RAYNALE offered his substitute as an original resolution.

Mr. EATON moved to strike out that part which directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to give the invitation.

Mr. DANFORTH moved to lay on the table, which was negatived.

Mr. ROBERTS submitted the following substitute:

Resolved, That the services of the resident clergymen be dispensed with, and that the Rev. J. D. PIERCE and Rev. Mr. WEBSTER, members of this body, be requested to officiate alternately.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. RAYNALE hoped the motion would not prevail. He believed the Convention was laboring under some misunderstanding on the subject. It was true that a committee had been appointed to invite the resident clergy to meet the Convention, and open the daily sessions with religious exercises. It was also true that the committee had reported that they had performed that duty, and that the committee had been discharged; but it was also true that all the resident clergy had not been invited. He knew of one to whom the invitation had not been extended. He had been told by the chairman of the committee that he should not invite that clergyman.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG—I regret the committee to whom this duty was assigned, have failed so to discharge it as to meet the approbation of my honorable colleague from Oakland. The committee, sir, were strangers in this community, and sought information from respectable residents of the place, by whom they were referred to the clergymen who have officiated for us, and were informed they were the only resident clergymen in the place; and now, Mr. PRESIDENT, is the first time I have ever heard the name of any other person mentioned as a resident clergyman. The committee were both strangers to the gentlemen who have, since their invitation, conducted our devotional exercises; and intended in all good faith to discharge their duties, and can but regret that their action has failed to satisfy any member of this Convention. The resolution offered by my worthy colleague, casting censure upon the committee, I consider neither kind nor courteous, and think its adoption would leave the Convention in a fickle position before the public, having already, through their committee, invited the resident clergy, enjoyed their services, and discharged their committee. True, my friend, Mr. RAYNALE, told me he had a Universalist minister here, but he did not inform me he was a resident, and I supposed he was retained for his own special benefit. I trust the resolution in its present form will not pass.

Mr. RAYNALE was sorry to see any feeling excited upon the subject. He should not have called out the gentlemen [Mr. VAN VALKENBURG] if he could have avoided it. The gentleman seemed to intimate that he did not know there was a Universalist clergyman in the place, and that he must invite that clergyman in order to give satisfaction. He would again repeat that the gentleman said he did not recognize him as a clergyman, and that he would not invite him. He [Mr. R.] had been driven to the necessity of doing something. Dissatisfaction existed among the members of the Convention. He considered this the most proper mode of having the matter settled. He was opposed to appropriating money from the treasury to pay for the services of the clergymen—he thought it unconstitutional. The resolution he proposed, if adopted, would dispose of the matter more satisfactorily.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—No arrangement having been made for the services of the clergymen who had been invited, one object in bringing this subject again before the Convention was to have that question settled. It was desirable to know whether the clergymen were to be paid by the State or by private subscription. He should prefer that the question be settled, rather than leave it indefinite. He understood, also, that there was one clergyman, a resident of the place, who had not been invited. If the committee did not know of it, they are excusable—if they did, the object of the resolution had not been carried out by the committee.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE had not been aware, till he saw the journal of this morning, that the committee had been discharged, he having been out of the Hall at the time the report was made. He had suggested to the chairman to report in part. In reply to the question whether the committee had made any proposition in respect to the pay of the ministers invited, he had only to say, that it was no part of the business of the committee to do any such thing. They were not instructed, either by the resolution, or by the Convention in any other form, to make any provision or terms in regard to payment. When he came here he was wholly unacquainted with the clergymen of the place. He had inquired and was informed that there were two laboring here, and the committee invited them. After the report was made, which he had supposed to be only in part, others were said to be here as residents; but he had no knowledge of their names or residence till this morning. Such was his position in regard to this whole matter.

Mr. ROBERTS had sent up the substitute to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Oakland, under an impression, as the Convention cannot make any appropriation for the payment of those clergymen who may officiate here, that the next legislature will be applied to, and an expense of one or two thousand dollars incurred in debate on the subject. He should be glad to retain the services of the resident clergy in the manner pointed out, but should be opposed to it if they were to be paid by an appropriation hereafter to be made.

Mr. BUSH said he had not intended to rise on this occasion; but as a resident, it must be presumed that he knew the facts. He would state the facts as he knew them. As a resident, he knew of but two clergymen who were such by profession. A Mr. Sanford, who conducts a paper, preaches sometimes, but does not make it a profession. There is another person who preaches occasionally; a Mr. Tooker, who is a very intelligent man and a respectable citizen, but does not follow preaching as a profession. He [Mr. B.] knew of but two who did.

Mr. BRITAIN said that since his arrival at Lansing he had inquired of several of its citizens the number and names of their resident clergymen, and in every instance he had been informed that there were four. He supposed, of course, that four would be invited by the committee; and he heard this morning with disappointment the declaration of the honorable chairman that but two had been invited. The Reverend Mr. Tooker, of the Baptist denomination, had been universally spoken of as a worthy man. He had both seen and heard him, and appearances certainly were in accordance with these statements. That he lives at the lower town is true, but Mr. Sapp, one of the invited clergymen, lives there also, and farther from this capitol than Mr. Tooker's residence. If Mr. Tooker labors at his trade a portion of his time to support himself and family, and thus make lighter the burthens of his people, he is certainly none the less entitled to consideration on that account.

Mr. WITHERELL had no objection to the invitation of more clergymen, if there were any more in the place; but he objected to sending the Sergeant-at-Arms after them. It seems to be assuming too menacing an attitude.

Mr. McLEOD—Mr. President—If I have rightly apprehended this discussion, the vexed point is this: that two only of the resident clergymen have been invited under the rule, while, in reality, there are three or four to whom the invitation should have been extended. It is not to be supposed that this exclusion was the result of a mere difference of opinion in matters of religious belief. I cannot suppose that the committee would venture to prostitute the delegated sovereignty of Michigan, which we hold in our hands, to the cause of either party or sect. We are free, and shall remain so, to worship the Great God as we will, without let or hindrance from any created being, be our creed as broad as the winds of heaven. I do not mean to oppose the usage of prefacing our deliberations with prayer. Far from it! I look upon it rather as a tribute to the moral sentiment of the people, precisely as I viewed the proposition of my friend from Chippewa, as a tribute to national pride. In that case I voted that our broad flag should be given to the breeze; and in this case I shall vote for the ceremony of devotion. But, to my view, all that we need and all that we should require of a model chaplain is this: a well-dressed, gentleman-like person, who shall make a brief, business like prayer, and when his task is finished, shall retire to—parts unknown.

Mr. BAGG would briefly define his position: as an individual, he thought he could suit himself best in prayer; but as the Convention was a public body, he had voted for the resolution to invite the clergy to engage in devotional exercises in deference to public opinion, and he should go for the people paying them. If it is the public opinion that the Convention should have clergymen to open the daily sessions with prayer, the public should pay for their services.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to strike out the words "the Sergeant-at-Arms," and insert "a committee of three," which Mr. RAYNALE accepted.

Mr. WITHERELL—It is proposed to say in the outset how we are to pay them. Who has asked for pay? They have been merely invited. Whenever the question comes up for payment, the Convention can decide on the mode.

Mr. EATON said he saw the propriety of having the question settled. The services of those clergymen have been required. They have been invited to attend here, and they would most probably have a right to make a charge and present it to be audited. He was opposed to the payment out of the treasury, because he thought it would be an infraction of the constitution. Though he had taken no oath as a delegate in the Convention to support the constitution, yet he felt bound by that instrument, with other members on that floor.

The question was taken on indefinitely postponing, and lost, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Backus, J. Bartow, Bush, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Comstock, Danforth, Daniels, Edmunds, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Harvey, Kingsley, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Witherell, President—34.

NAYS.—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsly, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Desnoyer, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Hascall, Hixon, Kinne, Marvin, McLeod, McClelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Town, Walker, Warden, Wells, Williams, Willard, Woodman—61.

The question was taken on the substitute offered by Mr. ROBERTS, and negatived. The question recurring on the original resolution,

Mr. J. CLARK moved to strike out the clause relating to the payment of the clergy.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG moved to add, that the clergymen who have been invited, be informed of the action of the Convention on the subject. Which was accepted by Mr. RAYNALE.

The question recurring on Mr. CLARK's motion to strike out,

Mr. FRALICK had hoped when the subject was brought up this morning, that the Convention would have come to some final settlement of the question. If the question of pay was not settled now, some thousands of dollars would probably be expended upon the matter afterwards. If members wanted prayers, let the members pay for them. That was his view of the meaning of the constitution.

The motion to strike out was lost.

Mr. WHITE moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Lost.

Mr. McLEOD said, in order to give an opportunity for the expression of opinion on the subject, he moved that the Convention, on Monday next, shall proceed to the election of a chaplain.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to add, "who shall receive such compensation as shall be subscribed by the members of the Convention for that purpose." Which Mr. McLEOD accepted.

Mr. BRITAIN begged permission of the Convention to detain them for a few moments, in answering the statement of the delegate from Wayne, [Mr. EATON.] That gentleman attempted to maintain the proposition that the Convention had unlimited control over the whole subject, and that it could as legally employ and pay a chaplain as any officer of the Convention. Mr. B. could not draw any such conclusion. The Constitution provides that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." The only law under which this Convention can appropriate money, is that in pursuance of which this Convention was called and organized, (approved March 9th, 1850,) and that only authorizes the Convention "to appoint a president, one or more secretaries, a sergeant-at-arms, one or more reporters and such messengers as their convenience shall require." These officers, and these only, can be paid in pursuance of the provisions of this law. A chaplain cannot be so paid unless he is considered one of the officers above named, and thus provided for.

The Legislature of last winter made no provision for the payment of a chaplain; and in justification of that Legislature he begged permission to say that they had no constitutional right to make such provision. There was no authority for such an appropriation in the constitution; but, on the other hand, a fair and impartial interpretation of the constitution would seem to forbid it.

He was aware that this was an extremely delicate and difficult subject—that many men would not be satisfied with any construction of the constitution which withheld it from them; and, he regretted to say, he had frequently seen persons, whose high moral pretensions justified an expectation of better things, engaged in creating prejudices against faithful supporters of the constitution, who happened to stand between them and the treasury, by pointing to them as persons opposed to religion and morality. He had not only seen this injustice but he had felt it, even after having voted for a chaplain and contributed liberally from his own pocket for his support, and he now called upon the religious portion of this Convention to cooperate with us in maintaining with fidelity the constitution which we have many of us so often sworn to support, and in refusing to permit two or three chaplains from pressing a claim upon the next Legislature for services, and thus drawing two or three thousand dollars from the treasury in the discussion of the subject, in addition to the salary ultimately allowed them. And I call upon them also, in all frankness and honesty, to justify us to the people for continuing to oppose all appropriations of money from the treasury for the payment of a chaplain, until such appropriation shall be authorized by a constitution of their adoption.

The question was taken on Mr. McLEOD's substitute and lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Axford, Beardsley, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Bush, Choate, S. Clark, Cook, Danforth, Edmunds, Gale, Gibson, Hascall, Kinne, Leach, Lee, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mowry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Storey, Town, Van Valkenburg, Wait, Webster, Wells, Whittemore, Willard, Witherell—38.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hixon, Lovell, Marvin, Moore, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, Raynale, Redfield, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Walker, Warden, White, Williams, Woodman, President—55.

And the question being on the resolution offered by Mr. RAYNALE, Mr. ALVORD called for the yeas and nays, and the same being ordered, the resolution was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Hascall, Kinne, Leach, Marvin, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Raynale, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Town, Walker, Warden, Webster, Williams, Willard, Woodman—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Backus, Bagg, Bush, Carr, Chandler, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Danforth, Daniels, Edmunds, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hixon, Lovell, McLeod, Moore, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Skinner, Soule, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburg, Wait, Wells, White, Whittemore, Witherell, President—35.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the Constitution that no act of the Legislature shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title.

Mr. CHURCH asked to be excused from serving on the committee on printing. He knew nothing of the matter, and as he was of opinion that a more efficient man than himself should stand between the printers and the treasury, he asked to be excused.

Mr. CHURCH was excused and Mr. BRITAIN appointed.

Mr. WITHERELL moved that when the Convention adjourn it adjourn to Monday next. Lost.

On motion of Mr. McLEOD, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, (6th day,) June 8th.

The Convention was called to order by the President.

Mr. COOK said, as the journals did not show on what day members arriving since the opening of the Convention had taken their seats, he would announce the presence of his colleague, Hon. J. B. GRAHAM.

Mr. WALKER announced the arrival of Hon. H. HATHAWAY of Macomb.

Mr. CHANDLER announced the attendance of Hon. EBENEZER DANIELS of Lenawee.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. COOK: of H. Waldron, E. H. C. Wilson and others, of Hillsdale county, asking that the word "white" may be stricken out of the revised Constitution. Referred to committee on elective franchise.

By Mr. CRARY: of Lewis Wilmarth and 241 citizens of Cal'houn county, praying the Convention to abolish the institution of the Grand Jury. Referred to the committee on bill of rights.

REPORTS.

Mr. McLEOD, from the committee on the mode of amending and revising the Constitution, submitted the following report:

Mode of amending and revising the Constitution.

Section 1. Any amendment or amendments to this Constitution may be proposed in the Senate or House of Representatives; and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to the two houses, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their journal, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and referred to the Legislature then next to be chosen, and shall be published for three months previous to the time of making such choice. And if, in the Legislature next chosen as aforesaid, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by two-thirds of all the members elected to each house, then it shall be the duty of the Legislature to submit such proposed amendment or amendments to the people, in such a manner and at such a time as the Legislature shall prescribe; and if the people shall ratify and approve such amendment or amendments by a majority of the electors qualified to vote for members of the Legislature, voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become part of the Constitution.

Sec. 2. At the general election to be held in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and in each fifteenth year thereafter, and also at such times as the Legislature may by law provide, the question of a general revision of the Constitution shall be decided by the electors qualified to vote for members of the Legislature; and in case a majority of the electors so qualified, voting at such election, shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the Legislature, at its next session, shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

The report was read, accepted, laid on the table and ordered printed.

Mr. S. CLARK, from the committee on the bill of rights, submitted the following report:

31. All acts of the legislature contrary to this or any other article of this Constitution shall be void.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the report was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Mr. GARDINER, from the committee on printing, to whom was referred the resolutions relative to printing journals, &c., reported the following resolutions, and recommended their adoption:

Resolved, That the State Printer be instructed to print an edition of 480 copies of the daily official journal of this Convention, including the constitution adopted by this Convention, in book form, for binding; and that he be instructed to print a like number of all reports of committees for binding.

Resolved, That the contractor for doing the binding for the State, be instructed to bind, in the same manner as the journals of the legislature are now bound, the journals and such documents as may be printed by order of this Convention, in one volume—the reports to be inserted as an appendix to the journals.

Report accepted, amendments agreed to, and adopted.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following:

Resolved, That there be added to the committee on the judiciary department six members from other occupations and professions than that of the law.

Mr. B. said he offered the resolution as expressive of the wishes of many members of the Convention. The committee, as it then stood, was composed entirely of members of the legal profession.

There was throughout the state, or at least in his county, [Jackson,] something of a prejudice, a feeling against lawyers; and knowing this to be the case, a report from a committee composed entirely of lawyers would be regarded in a different light than the same report would be if coming from a committee representing other interests than the legal profession. It was not only expedient, but just and proper, that other professions should be represented on the judiciary committee, as all classes of citizens were alike interested in this department of the state government. For these reasons he had presumed to offer the resolution.

Mr. J. BARTOW had no objection to the resolution, but thought the reason assigned far from being a good one. Perhaps the people of Jackson had good reason for their feeling of hostility to lawyers—they doubtless had cause. If the feeling of hostility was to be made a test, it would exclude from the committee all professions. In his section there was a strong feeling against millers, and trades of all kinds.

Mr. CORNELL said the feeling of hostility against the legal profession was as stated by his colleague. It was owing to the fact that there had been so much vacillation in the legislature. That body was generally composed of a large number of lawyers, and yet the law shifted so often that common people could not understand it. He desired a plain, simple code of laws, so that every one might understand them. He hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON thought if there was any value in the reason assigned for the resolution, it would equally apply to the amendment he proposed. He moved to strike out "six" and insert "ten."

The amendment was carried and the resolution adopted—yeas 85, nays 11.

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a supreme court to consist of three judges; and to provide for a division of the state into judicial circuits, and for the election of a circuit judge in each circuit. And that the legislature be empowered to increase the number of circuits and circuit judges at the expiration of every five years, and not oftener.

Mr. WITHERELL presented the resolution with the view of laying the system before the judiciary committee.

The state was but partially settled now, and the circuit judges could perform the duties of a supreme court; but the population was rapidly increasing, and before another Convention was called to revise the constitution, every part might be densely populated. The Upper Peninsula was destined to contain a population as great as a similar extent of country in the states of New York and New Hampshire. Two or more circuit judges in that region would be required, and they could not attend the sessions of the supreme court. Some provision might be made for setting aside a certain number of circuit judges to form a supreme court.

Referred to committee on the judiciary. Mr. ALVORD offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on education be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a system of free schools to be supported by general taxation. Adopted.

By Mr. BAGG:

Resolved, That the committee on banks and incorporations be and hereby are directed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of incorporating into the constitution of this state, as a distinct section thereof, the following, to wit: The legislature shall have no power to pass any act granting any charter for banking purposes.

Mr. B. offered the resolution under the full conviction that it expressed the popular will. Our government was based on equality and the principles of equal rights. He believed all banks were based on a doctrine of injustice and unequal rights. Adopted.

On motion of Mr. WELLS,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the judges of the supreme court to report to the Legislature at the commencement of each session, what defects they have observed in existing laws, and propositions for amendment.

On motion of Mr. EATON,

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise, &c., inquire into the expediency of so amending the constitution of this State as to secure to the people of this State an annual registry of the names of all legal voters previous to the election.

On motion of Mr. EATON,

Resolved, That the committee on education inquire into the expediency of making constitutional provision for the establishment of such a system of common schools as will, by taxation, bestow the facility of acquiring a good education on every child in this State.

On motion of Mr. WARDEN,

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the right of suffrage to aliens, who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, in accordance with the naturalization laws thereof, and who shall have resided in this State for one year next preceding any election.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS,

Resolved, That the State Printer be instructed to print 480 copies of all articles, and 480 copies of all reports ordered printed for the use of this Convention.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that all acts of the Legislature be submitted to the Justices of the Supreme Court, to decide upon their constitutionality before they take effect, and that subsequently they have no power to declare any act so passed upon to be unconstitutional.

And also, that said committee inquire into the expediency of so simplifying the judicial proceedings as to have but one form of action. And also to provide that the Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of the Constitution, shall appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to reduce to a written code the whole body of the law of this State, or so much thereof as to them shall seem expedient.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE,

Resolved, That the committee on incorporations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing as follows:

1. That the credit of the State shall not be loaned to any person or persons, nor to any company or association, nor shall the State ever be liable for the stock of any corporation whatever.

2. The legislature shall have no power to pass acts of incorporation, except for municipal purposes.

3. In all cases where damage is done by any corporation to private property, the corporation shall pay to the full amount of such damage.

4. The legislature may pass general laws, under which associations may be formed for all purposes of business, and for religious and charitable objects; but no rights, exemptions, privileges or immunities shall be granted to any association or corporate body which are not secured to every person in the State.

5. No special charters shall be granted for banking purposes, and no association or corporation now existing, or hereafter to exist by virtue of general laws, shall issue any bills under a less denomination than five dollars after the first of January, 185—.

6. The legislature shall have no power to pass any act sanctioning the refusal of any person or persons, association or corporate body, issuing bills, to pay the same on demand.

7. Whenever any banking association shall become insolvent, the bill-holders shall be entitled to preference in payment over all other creditors, and the stockholders shall be responsible in their individual capacity for all the debts and liabilities of the same.

8. No act under which banking associations may be formed shall go into operation until the same shall have been approved by a direct vote of the people at some general election subsequent to its passage.

Mr. TIFFANY moved that the committee on the judiciary be instructed to report a judiciary system which shall not include the present system of county courts.

Mr. T. said he offered the proposition to ascertain the sense of the Convention, as to whether the present system should be retained, or some other adopted. He did not offer it as expressing any opinion of his own.

Mr. BAGG moved to amend by adding, "with the exception of the county of Wayne."

Resolution laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. STOREY,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a constitutional provision which shall require the legislature, in making an amendment to an existing law, to re-enact and publish the entire act.

On motion of Mr. FRALICK,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for single Representative and Senatorial districts, and for biennial sessions of the legislature, in the new Constitution.

Mr. CROUSE offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on printing be required to cause ——— copies of the rules of this Convention to be printed in the form of a manual, together with such other information as they shall deem useful and appropriate.

After some debate on the printing already ordered, the resolution was referred to the committee on printing.

On motion of Mr. BAGG,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of incorporating a provision in the constitution, for any person to sell or vend ardent spirits, or other intoxicating liquors, wholesale or retail, in this State, without license; provided, that such person or persons shall be liable for all the pernicious consequences arising from such sale, to be collected in a court of law; and that the only proof necessary for conviction and judgment, shall be that the defendant or defendants had sold or given to such person or persons ardent spirits, or other intoxicating drinks, twenty-four hours prior to the commission of such offence or offences; and all persons who shall have sold to such defendant or defendants, shall be joined in defence, and pay, after judgment, in proportion to the quantity sold or given to the offender by each, respectively.

Mr. B. said his object in offering the resolution was to show to the temperance men throughout the state that he was willing to render every facility in forwarding the cause of temperance. He thought it had done much good.

He believed the present licensé law a great impediment in the progress of temperance. The proposition to allow all, or any person, to sell ardent spirits, and hold them strictly liable for the consequences, was much better. At any rate, he wished to tax the ingenuity of the committee to invent some law regulating the sale of liquor, and not leave it to those whose heads were confused with the effects of hard drinking.

Mr. B. was not in favor of total abstinence; yet he never drank without being sick, and occasionally he was very ill.

Mr. WALKER wished to know if the gentleman [Mr. B.] was sick before or after he drank?

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WARDEN,

Resolved, That the committee on the punishment of crimes be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the abolition of capital punishment

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURG,

Resolved, That the committee on township officers and township government be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reducing the number of town officers and town expenses.

On motion of Mr. ORR,

Resolved, That the judiciary committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of dispensing with our present grand jury system.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND,

Resolved, That the committee on banking and corporations inquire into the expediency of engrafting upon the constitution a provision requiring all banking institutions to be established by general laws, and to be based on state stock securities, so as to make the bill-holder perfectly secure; and that such general laws, before they take effect, be submitted to a vote of the people.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND,

Resolved, That the committee on county officers and county government be instructed to inquire into the propriety of adopting the commissioner system in the counties, or of reducing the number of supervisors to three or five in each county, either electing them by districts or by the whole county.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of abolishing the county court system, and of organizing a supreme court system, and requiring the judges thereof to discharge circuit duties.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on state officers be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the election of the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the people.

Mr. BRITAIN rose and said: Mr. President—I am aware that the resolution may be unpopular, because it is original, and is not in accordance with the practice of other states; but I trust the Convention will permit me to state briefly some of the reasons which induced me to present it, and which, I think, should commend it to the consideration of this Convention.

1st. It is a resolution of inquiry only, and its adoption can do no harm.

2d. If there be any argument in favor of the election of the presiding officer of the Senate by the people, that argument, with even increased force, calls upon us to provide for the election of a Speaker of the House of Representatives by the people.

3d. It will with more certainty secure to the House an efficient presiding officer; for no state convention of either party will ever put in nomination an inexperienced or an inefficient man for that responsible station.

4th. When elected, he will feel his responsibilities, and have two months to qualify himself for his official duties. He will thus be able to organize the House and proceed at once to business, and save to the state from ten to fifteen thousand dollars necessarily expended in the education of a Speaker, chosen in the present manner by the House, at the commencement of its session. Mr. President, I have said necessarily expended, because the Representative thus honored by the confidence of his associates, finds himself suddenly, and perhaps unexpectedly, elevated to the Speaker's chair, where he not only asks, but expects the forbearance, indulgence and support of the House, from the fact that he has had no opportunity whatever to qualify himself for his official duties; and the business of the House must necessarily move slowly while this suddenly chosen officer is qualifying himself for his duties.

5th. It secures to the people a chance for impartial committees in the House, by putting it out of the power of the candidate for the speakership to secure votes for himself by indicating the formation of important committees, and also by putting it out of the power of what is usually denominated the "third house," to dictate to the House who shall be chosen for Speaker, and procure the election of such a man as they have previously ascertained will use his prerogative in a manner acceptable to them. Will any one deny that these improper influences have been brought to bear upon the election of Speaker, or that they are hereafter to be anticipated under our present system? Is there any one present so unacquainted with the workings of human policy as to suppose that a Speaker ever was, or ever can be, chosen by the House free from the operation of those improper influences? Sir, I trust not.

Mr. President, I do not say that all candidates for the Speakership have been improperly engaged in those combinations, but I do mean to say that these combinations are thrown around every candidate for Speaker, whether he understands it or not, and that Speakers have seldom been chosen on account of their ability or fitness for the station, but in a great majority of cases, they have been chosen on account of their known or supposed opinions upon particular subjects, and relative to certain interests; and that person who supposes that a Speaker has been, or can be, chosen by the House without being affected by these influences has more charity for frail humanity than I have.

6th. The election of a Speaker by the people does not rob any county of its representative.

7th. The election of a Speaker by the people relieves him from all dependence upon a faction of the house, and even the whole house over which he is called upon to preside, and holds him directly responsible to the people, no portion of whom have an exclusive right to control him, and all of whom have an equal interest in the faithful and impartial discharge of his duties.

8th. The election of a Speaker by the people will effectually remove all causes for that ill feeling so frequently found to exist between a Speaker, chosen by the House, and a disappointed candidate, and which so frequently manifests itself in efforts to embarrass the Speaker to the detriment of public interest.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I beg leave to assure the convention that I have not said one word which was intended to be personal to any one. On the contrary, we cannot look back upon those who have, at different times, been appointed to preside over the deliberations of the House of Representatives, without pride and gratification.

Mr. President, the Speakers whom we have already had, have been as good as those whom we shall hereafter have. The several Houses heretofore elected have been as intelligent and patriotic as those hereafter will be. It is in vain to calculate upon reform in legislation until the manner of transacting legislative business be reformed; and the election of Speaker by the people is one of the most simple and desirable reforms which can be accomplished by this Convention.

On motion of Mr. REDFIELD,

The resolution was amended by adding the words, "whose per diem shall be the same as other members of that body." Adopted.

Mr. BEARDSLEY offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to aliens, now residents, and who shall hereafter become residents of this State, all the privileges of United States citizens within this State.

Mr. BAGG moved to amend by inserting the word "white" before "aliens," which was accepted by the mover, and the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND,

Resolved, That the committee on finance and taxation be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Auditor General, and requiring the legislature to provide for the transaction of the business of that officer at the county seat of the several counties, so far as such business concerns taxation.

On motion of Mr. BUSH,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of entitling each county at present organized to at least one representative.

On motion of Mr. H. BARTOW,

Resolved, That the committee on education be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the free schools to be English schools.

On motion of Mr. SOULE,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the distinction between law and equity proceedings; that all causes may be tried upon their merits, and allowing all persons to act as attorneys in any court.

Also, provide that all appeals shall be submitted to a jury, if either party in the suit shall require it.

Mr. WALKER offered the following:

That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that the regular sessions of the legislature shall not be held oftener than once in two years; and that after the first sixty days of any session, the members shall receive no compensation. Also, so that it shall require a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each House to create, alter or amend any law, except at such sessions as an entire revision of the laws shall have been ordered to be made in pursuance of a constitutional provision.

Mr. WALKER said he offered the resolution as expressing his own views. He believed the frequent changes, modifications and alterations in the laws to be a great evil, and a remedy would be applied to some extent by adopting biennial sessions. The proposition to require a two-thirds vote in the legislature to alter, create or amend any law, he thought a good one. Members of the legislature were elected without any special view in regard to changing a law, and when they assembled together, if a preference for the statutes of some other State, on any matter, was manifested, they set themselves to work to alter the law.

These changes were made without any corresponding change in public opinion—in fact, against the desire of the people. He thought the constitution ought to require something more than a bare majority to make a change. The resolution was offered to call the attention, not only of the committee, but of the whole Convention to the subject.

Resolution adopted.

On motion of Mr. FRALICK,

Resolved, That the committee on township officers and township government be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that the public business of townships and township officers be performed by three persons, instead of a larger, or the present number.

Resolved, That the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women be instructed to inquire into the expediency of securing to married women all property owned by them at the time of their marriage, or that they may at any time acquire by inheritance.

On motion of Mr. STURGIS,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the per diem of representatives of the legislature to two dollars.

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a constitutional provision rendering the Governor of the State ineligible to the office of United States Senator during the term for which he may be elected.

Mr. HASCALL moved to amend by inserting after "United States Senator," the words "or any other office;" which was adopted.

Mr. BACKUS moved to amend by inserting after the word "State," "and Judges of the Supreme Court."

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend the amendment by inserting after "Supreme," the words "and Circuit," which motion prevailed, and the amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL,

The resolution was amended by adding thereto the words "and for one year thereafter."

The resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HART,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be required to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Probate Court and creating some kind of County Court, with Surrogate and Probate jurisdiction.

Mr. LEACH offered the following, which by his request, was laid upon the table:

Resolved, That this Convention is in favor of biennial sessions of the Legislature.

Mr. WILLARD offered the following:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet at Detroit, on

Mr. BUSH asked if the gentleman intended to fill the blank with "the public square."

Mr. LEACH moved to indefinitely postpone the same.

Mr. BUSH demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; and the demand being sustained, the resolution was indefinitely postponed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Church, S. Mr. BRITAIN offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on printing, who were on the 7th inst. ordered to procure in convenient form for the use of each member of this Convention, a copy of the present Constitution of this State, be instructed to procure the printing, in the form of a manual, of the rules adopted by this Convention, with said Constitution, with lists of members and officers, showing their place of nativity, occupation, post office and present boarding house. Also, a calendar and statement of all standing committees of this Convention; and that 240 copies of the same be published for the use of this Convention.

Mr. J. BARTOW opposed the resolution on the ground that a sufficient number of copies of the Constitution had been already ordered, and the printing of a manual would be a useless expense.

After some explanation by Mr. BRITAIN, as to the printing ordered, and the use of a manual, the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY,

Resolved, That the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing married women to dispose of any property, real or personal, by will, without the consent of their husbands.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY,

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG offered the following:

Resolved, That one hundred and twenty copies of the manual of this Convention be bound in the same form and of the same material as the manual of the legislature of this state at its session of 1850.

Mr. J. CLARK moved to lay the resolution on the table, which was not agreed to.

Mr. BUSH moved to adjourn, but the Convention refused to adjourn.

The resolution, as offered by Mr. VAN VALKENBURG, was then adopted by yeas 47, nays 39.

On motion of Mr. HASCALL,

Resolved, That the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing all laws for the collection of debts under a limited amount.

Mr. WELLS moved that Mr. WITHERELL be excused from serving on the committee on the punishment of crimes; but the motion to excuse was lost.

The President announced the following committee on the invitation of clergymen, &c.: MESSRS. RAYNALE, J. D. PIERCE and WEBSTER.

On motion of Mr. COOK,

The Convention adjourned till Monday morning.

MONDAY, (7th day,) June 10.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY.

Journal of yesterday's proceedings corrected.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. FRALICK: of E. J. Penniman, D. H. Rowland, Bethuel Noyes, and 400 others, of Wayne county, in favor of biennial sessions of the Legislature, of limited duration, and single districts for Senators and Representatives, and county boards of supervisors, dividing counties when required into Representative districts.

Referred to committee on the legislative department.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG presented the petition of Hiram Barrett and 41 others of Oakland county, embracing a variety of improvements and amendments to the constitution.

Mr. VAN V. said the propositions were so many and so various, that he was unable to designate the appropriate committee to which it should be referred.

Mr. McLEOD—I move its reference to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

It was so referred.

Mr. BACKUS presented the proceedings of the common council of the city of Detroit, tendering the use of the City Hall for the use of the Convention, should it adjourn to that city. Laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT announced a communication from Orville B. Dibble on the same subject.

REPORTS.

Mr. McCLELLAND, from the committee on rules, submitted the two following, to be added to the standing rules of the Convention:

RULE 37. Every article shall receive three several readings previous to its being passed; and the second and third readings shall be on different days; and the third reading shall be on a day subsequent to that in which it has passed a committee of the whole, unless the Convention, by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, shall direct otherwise.

RULE 38. No article shall be committed or amended unless it has been twice read.

RULE 39. Every article when read a third time and passed, shall be referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The rules were severally adopted by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. J. CLARK, from the committee on the division of the powers of government, submitted the following:

ARTICLE —.

Division of the Powers of Government.

Section 1. The powers of this government shall be divided into three distinct departments, the Legislative, Executive and Judicial.

Sec. 2. No person or persons belonging to any one of these departments, nor either of the departments, shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except in the cases expressly provided for in the constitution.

Referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Mr. GARDINER, from the committee on printing, to whom was referred the resolutions relative to printing the proceedings and debates of this Convention, reported the same back to the Convention and recommended the following amendments, viz: Strike out of the first resolution, "one thousand copies," and insert "twelve hundred." Strike out of the second resolution, "one copy to each of the judges of a court of record in this State," and insert "one copy for the use of the office of each county clerk in this State, and one copy for the clerk of the supreme court;" to which they asked the concurrence of the Convention.

Which was agreed to.

Mr. STOREY proposed to amend by striking out the word "ten," and inserting "one hundred, to be deposited in the State library."

Which was agreed to, and the resolutions as amended were adopted.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN,

Resolved, That the committee on printing cause the rules this morning adopted to be printed with the rules.

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following:

Resolved, That for the purpose of preserving the purity and efficiency of future conventions to revise the constitution, the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for an election by the people of Presidents of such conventions; and in case of any doubt existing as to such expediency, said committee be instructed to consult precedents.

Mr. WITHERELL said he introduced the resolution to accompany the one introduced by the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN,] in relation to the election of Speaker of the House of Representatives. It would be just as well that the President be elected in the same way, and for the same purpose, and for the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Berrien. The reasons were very cogent, applicable and proper for the House of Representatives—they would be equally applicable in favor of the election of Presidents of the Convention by the people.

The resolution was negatived.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to provide for single representative districts in their report.

Which, on motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, was laid upon the table.

Mr. AMMON BROWN offered the following, which,

On motion of Mr. CRARY, was laid upon the table;

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to report an article or articles providing for single senatorial districts.

Mr. MORRISON offered the following:

Resolved, That corporations for banking purposes shall be formed, extended or renewed by special laws, but no such act of incorporation, extension or renewal shall take effect until the same shall have been submitted to the people at the next general election succeeding the passage of the same, for representatives, and approved by a majority of all the votes cast at such election for and against such law; and that but one act of incorporation, extension or renewal of any corporation with banking powers shall be passed during any one session of the Legislature. No such corporation shall be formed, extended or renewed for a longer period than fifteen years.

Referred to the committee on banking and other incorporations.

Mr. MORRISON offered the following, which was referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions:

Resolved, That when private property is taken for the use or benefit of the public, the necessity of using such property, and the just compensation to be made therefor, shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve freeholders, residing in the vicinity of such property, or by not less than three commissioners appointed by a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law. That private roads may be opened in the manner to be prescribed by law; but in every case the necessity of the road, and the amount of all damages to be sustained by the opening thereof, shall be first determined by a jury of freeholders; and such amount, together with the expenses of the proceedings, shall be paid by the person to be benefited.

Also the following, which was referred to the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women:

Resolved, That any person, in order to avail himself of any provision in this constitution, or of law exempting property from forced sale on executions, shall make and file (at such time as shall be prescribed by law, once in each year, with some officer to be designated by law in the township, village or city in which he resides,) an affidavit, setting forth a description of the property of which he is the owner, and the value thereof. Also a statement of the amount of his indebtedness.

On motion of Mr. BAGG,

On motion of Mr. McLEOD, the resolution was referred to the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. BEARDSLEY offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the judicial department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing any white male resident of this State, twenty-one years of age, to practice as an attorney and counsellor in any of the courts of law, and as a solicitor in chancery in this State, on filing a written notice of his intention in the office of the Clerk of the Supreme Court.

On motion of Mr. McLEOD, the resolution was amended by striking out the word "white."

Mr. S. CLARK moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Which motion was lost; when, on motion of Mr. CROUSE, the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY,

Resolved, That the committee on the judicial department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of including the fees of counsel, attorneys and solicitors in the costs of suits at law and in equity, and enforcing their payment by execution, against the losing party; and also of restricting counsel to certain fees in all the courts of this State; and attorneys and solicitors to such fees as shall be provided by law.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY,

Resolved, That the committee on the judicial department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting special and dilatory pleas and demurrers in all the courts of this State.

Mr. BEARDSLEY offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the right of suffrage to all white and single females, twenty-one years of age, and who are now or who shall hereafter become residents of this State.

Mr. CROUSE proposed to amend by adding after the word "single" the words "and married," which was accepted by the mover.

The resolution was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that no property of individuals shall be taken for the use of the State or of any corporation without payment therefor being first made.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the constitution that the Legislature shall pass no retrospective laws.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS,

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the constitution that private property shall not be taken for public use, or the use of corporations, municipal or otherwise, without compensation first provided, and actually paid or tendered.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the constitution that every person holding claims against the State may sue for such demand in like manner and with the same facility as suits may be brought against individuals.

Mr. WITHERELL would make a single observation. The Legislature would be always able to provide, whenever a case should be made out and a claim established. The report of the committee in favor of such a proposition would give it additional security and strength. The establishment of such a provision might bring the State under the liability of paying the balance of the five million loan. Though the parties holding the bonds have no equitable, they may have a legal claim. It has always been left for the Legislature to provide for the exigency of any case.

Mr. BACKUS—The resolution calls upon the committee to consider, and if necessary, report on a state of facts with which every member must be familiar—to inquire into the propriety of allowing suits to be commenced against the State, where citizens have just and legal claims, instead of requiring them to resort to the Legislature with their petition of right, subjecting their claims to postponement from session to session, sometimes without obtaining satisfaction and redress. He (Mr. B.) saw no objection that the State be subject to the course of proceedings that citizens and corporations are subject to. If the State owe just debts, let the State be compelled to pay. This was merely a resolution of inquiry, and he did not wish to go far on the present occasion in discussing the question. There was one point he would mention. It would supersede all the protracted discussion which arises and has arisen on applications to the Legislature for the payment of doubtful claims. To the bonds of the State it does not go. He would take some other opportunity of stating his views on the subject.

Mr. WITHERELL was afraid of some Galphin claim coming up. He did not wish to see such claims as that galvanized. He did not feel disposed to go into an extended argument to show why this should not be inquired into. If such a principle were adopted, and the State were liable to be sued at all times, suits against the State would be as plenty as blackberries. The State has never shown a disposition to do injustice to claimants. Claims have been fairly examined, and appropriations made for their payment; and several hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid out of the treasury on claims adjudicated which it would have been difficult to establish in a court of law.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. O'BRIEN,

Resolved, That the committee on exemptions, &c., be requested to inquire into the expediency of exempting the property of every individual, to the amount of five hundred dollars, from sale on execution or other process of law or equity.

On motion of Mr. ALVORD,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the court of probate.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, tive franchise be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting duelists and persons guilty of betting on elections from exercising the right of suffrage.

On motion of Mr. SKINNER,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be and they are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the supervisors of each county to make as many judicial districts in each county, (not exceeding the number of representative districts,) as, in their opinion, will best suit the convenience and wants of the people thereof; in each of which shall be elected a district justice for the term of four years, with such civil and criminal jurisdiction as shall be conferred by law.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN,

Resolved, That the State Printer be requested to print twelve hundred copies of the daily journal for the use of this Convention, instead of ten hundred, as heretofore ordered.

On motion of Mr. STOREY,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from legislating on any claim against the State.

Resolved, That the committee on State officers, (except executive,) be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating a board of State Auditors, who shall act upon all claims against the State, and from whose decision there may be an appeal to the supreme court.

On motion of Mr. DANIELS,

Resolved, That the committee on punishment of crime be instructed to inquire into the propriety of incorporating into the constitution the establishment of a house of refuge or correction, for the punishment of juvenile and female offenders.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON,

Mr. MOORE offered an amendment to the Bill of Rights, as follows: "Any citizen of this State who may hereafter be engaged, either directly or indirectly, in a duel, either as principal or accessory before the fact, shall forever be disqualified from holding any office under the constitution and laws of this State.

Referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. CHAPEL offered the following:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, no member is entitled to his per diem, unless his name appears daily upon the journals of this Convention. Sickness only excepted.

Mr. WITHERELL—Does that provide for cases where leave of absence is granted?

Mr. McLEOD moved to amend by adding, "and when not excused by the Convention." If [said Mr. McL.] we have to send our chairman of committee of supplies repeatedly to Detroit for stationery, it would not be right to deprive him of his per diem allowance.

Mr. ——— The names of members do not go on the journal.

The CHAIR—When the roll is called, the names only of those who are absent are noted on the journal.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Then the absentees will be entitled to pay, and no others.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the resolution was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. HART,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be required to inquire into the expediency of incorporating in the constitution, authority to the Legislature to establish courts of conciliation.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the committee on the judicial department be instructed to report a provision for the new constitution, authorizing the Legislature to establish courts of conciliation, with powers and duties prescribed by law, whose jurisdiction shall be cœextensive with organized towns; and after such courts shall have been established for seven years, to create similar courts of wider jurisdiction.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the committee on finance and taxation be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so restricting any system of taxation as to prevent one citizen acquiring the right to the property of another by virtue of a tax title, and that they be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of having all lands escheat to the State on which taxes have not been paid for — years.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting in the constitution a provision substantially as follows: "Lands now flowed, and unimproved lands which may hereafter be flowed by the erection of mill dams, shall be paid for in the manner to be provided by law; and the actual value of the land flowed shall be determined by a jury of freeholders, and such value and the expenses of determining the same shall be paid by the party erecting the dam."

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing all laws for the compulsory collection of debts after the year 1854.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he would make one remark. The gentleman from Kalamazoo had sent up a resolution of a similar character. The resolution he (Mr. W.) proposed was more extended; it contemplated the abolishing of all laws for the collection of debts—such law not to be put in operation till after the year 1854.

On motion of Mr. HIXON,

Resolved, That the committee on the judicial department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing all laws for the collection of debts.

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL,

Resolved, That the committee on the schedule be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing in said schedule for the payment of such expenses of this Convention as have not been provided for by the Legislature.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL,

Resolved, That the committee on towns be instructed to inquire into the expediency of merging the offices of supervisor, assessor, commissioners of highways and directors of the poor into one office, and the duties to be performed by three individuals.

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE,

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of prohibiting the Legislature from passing any resolutions of instructions to our Senators in Congress, unless by a two-thirds vote of the members elected to each House.

On motion of Mr. CHAPEL,

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department inquire into the expediency of so altering the present mileage of members of the Legislature to and from the capital of this State as not to exceed eight cents per mile.

The PRESIDENT announced the following additional members of the committee on the judicial department, under the resolution of the 8th inst: Messrs. BUTTERFIELD, HIXON, COMSTOCK, COOK, ASAHE L BROWN, HATHAWAY, MOWRY, LEE, TOWN and BAGG.

Additional members of the committee on the government and judicial policy of the upper peninsula, under resolution of the 8th inst: Messrs. ROBERTSON and GRHAM.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention went into committee of the whole on the Bill of Rights, Mr. BRITAIN in the chair.

Section 3 was read—"No man or set of men are entitled to exclusive or separate privileges."

Mr. WALKER offered the following substitute: "All men are entitled to equal rights and privileges."

Mr. WALKER said: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the principle as stated in the third article, as reported by the committee, is subject to a great many limitations. Though no man or set of men are entitled to exclusive rights and privileges, yet they are certainly entitled to separate privileges. Many are the relations of life in which the principle there declared is not a fact—that men are entitled to exclusive privileges. I think the amendment is more expressive of the principle intended to be asserted.

Mr. CRARY—I would ask what the privilege of voting is—whether it be a privilege of such a character?

Mr. WALKER—I suppose it to be a right.

Mr. CRARY said the section as reported did not open the door which the amendment does. The amendment asserts that all are entitled to equal rights, one of which the gentleman [Mr. WALKER] says is the right of voting. Then every man is entitled to the right of voting. If the amendment should be adopted, it would make no difference what other distinctions were made in the other articles, no amendment could be made in the elective franchise.

Mr. WALKER—The language of the proposed amendment may not be strictly correct, but it obviates some objections in the other proposition. It states that no men are entitled to exclusive privileges. It seems to me to be the adoption of Fourierism to the fullest extent. The object he had in view might be accomplished to some extent by striking out the word "separate."

The substitute was non-concurred in.

Mr. REDFIELD moved to strike out the words "or separate," which did not prevail.

Section 5. No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies, or theological or religious seminaries, nor property belonging to the state be appropriated for any such purpose.

Mr. FRALICK offered an amendment, to add to the end of the section, "and no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the payment of any religious services."

Mr. F. said he offered the amendment for this reason: that the proposed article in the bill of rights does not close up the gap by which thousands of dollars have been taken from the treasury contrary, he believed, to the intention of the framers of the constitution. If the proposed amendment be inserted, no money can be drawn from the treasury for the payment of religious services for the state. If this be put in, the question will be settled which has been agitated in every session of the legislature since we became a state; some contending that the article in the constitution did not authorize the legislature to employ a chaplain to be paid by the state, others that it did. Thousands of dollars had been expended in a manner which he (Mr. F.) believed the people of the state did not intend.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG said: Mr. President—I hope this amendment will not prevail, though I am glad the subject has been brought before this Convention. It is well known to gentlemen upon this floor that this question has been a prolific subject of controversy these many years, and has cost the state much more in its discussion than would have been required to effect the object of the friends of morality and religion. It is high time this vexed question was settled in our organic law, that the time and energies of future legislatures may be spared for other purposes. Shall we leave it an open question for all future time to agitate and distract our legislative bodies? To excite discord and animosity between men who come here for one common object, and who should have but one common interest? Or shall we, sir, put this question above and beyond the reach of agitators, and stamp upon our Constitution that sound moral impress which I am confident pervades this Convention? I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne, and hope the expression of this Convention will put to rest this agitating question.

Sir, are we ready to say we will forever exclude from our legislative halls the services of the clergy; services rendered doubly sacred by uniform practice since our pilgrim fathers first landed on this continent? If gentlemen have no reverence for the law of God, which requires them to acknowledge him in all their ways, have they no reverence for long established precedent? Let us refer them to the advice of the Father of our Country in his Farewell Address, uttered as he was about to bid adieu to his public labors, when this whole nation hung with breathless silence and throbbing heart upon his lips:

"Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connexions with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on the minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

"It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who, that is a sincere friend to it, can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundations of the fabric?"

Sir, these are the sentiments of a man who was eminently virtuous, whose name is embalmed in the heart of every American; sentiments handed down with religious reverence from his day to the present. Is there any one here ready to dispense with these cherished customs; any to forbid us to employ a clergyman to open our daily sessions with prayer? Who upon this floor will array himself against the institutions of religion and morality? Where the man who is ready to throw off all moral restraint and rush upon the thick bosses of Jehovah's buckler? I ask where? Beware, vain man! he dasheth his enemies in pieces like a potter's vessel. Hast thou an arm like God? Can'st thou thunder with a voice like him?

I trust, Mr. Chairman, I shall never see the day when this beautiful Peninsula, the home of my adoption, with her chrystal lakes, her extended plains, her exuberant soil and her mineral wealth, shall, through her representatives, repudiate the government of that Almighty Being who has given us this goodly heritage, who showers upon us the early and the latter rain, clothes our fields with verdure, and satisfieth the desires of every living thing. Let us remember, Mr. Chairman, let us remember, gentlemen of the committee, pilgrims to eternity, we have duties to discharge which will leave their impress upon our institutions for all coming ages, and will connect our action with the weal or woe of generations yet unborn; and above all, let us remember "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

I call upon you, Mr. Chairman, I call upon you, gentlemen of the Committee, I adjure you by all that is desirable in life, and all your hopes for the future, oppose this amendment, individually, unitedly, that you may enjoy the consciousness of having discharged your duty; that you may enjoy the thanks of a grateful constituency and the smiles of an approving God.

Mr. HASCALL would inquire whether the object of the gentleman could not be obtained without the application of the root of all evil.

Mr. WITHERELL proposed to amend by adding "except chaplains appointed by the two houses of the legislature."

Mr. McCLELLAND recommended the gentleman from Wayne to withdraw the proposed amendment, and offer it again when the legislative article should come under consideration.

Mr. FRALICK assented, and withdrew his amendment.

Section 6. The civil and religious rights, privileges and capacities of no individual shall be diminished or enlarged on account of his opinions or belief concerning matters of religion.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out the word "religious," and insert "political." Which was adopted.

Section 7. Every person may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no laws shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. In all prosecutions for libels, the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libellous is true, and was published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted; and the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the fact.

Mr. BARTOW, of Genesee, moved to strike out the words "with good motives and for justifiable ends."

Mr. B. said he offered the amendment with the view of bringing before the Convention a question which has agitated the courts and legislative bodies to some extent, and thus take the sense of the committee, whether there should be any distinction between the law relating to libel and every other law. There is one maxim that has long prevailed, that truth is mighty and shall prevail. If so, it ought to be a sufficient justification of publication that it was true. The article contains a provision that the liberty of the press shall not be abridged; yet by the words he proposed to strike out, it was abridged—that the truth shall only be published for good motives and justifiable ends. He thought it wrong to go beyond the truth. The motives and the ends were unnecessary to be gone into, in matters charged as libellous, the truth should be the justification without any inquiry into motives. The truth should not be considered libellous. No man should be punished for publishing anything that in itself is true.

Mr. HASCALL.—The end may be attained, so far as a civil suit is concerned; but this provision applies to criminal suits, and is necessary to preserve the public peace and maintain good order in society. In civil suits the construction of the article in the constitution has been given according to the views of the gentleman from Genesee.

Mr. ——— would inquire whether there was any distinction in this respect between criminal and civil proceedings in cases of libel. He had supposed that every man would be justified by proving the truth of the publication; that in any case he should not suffer any penalty of law for publishing the truth.

Mr. WITHERELL would say the sole object of the provision was to prevent the stirring up of quarrels and the publication of matters which it is improper for the public to know, and which are sometimes improperly obtained. It is well known that difficulties sometimes occur in families; but it is better they should be forgotten, than raked up and published in the newspapers. He is allowed to publish, but liable to be punished if he stirs up broils and animosities in a community with bad intent. The jury are judges whether that was published with good intent or from malicious and bad motives. If from bad motives and evil intent, the community holds him liable, and punishes him for the malice he exhibits. For the intended evil he is held responsible.

Mr. ROBERTSON was opposed to the amendment. The proper object to be obtained would be by throwing the onus on the prosecution. If we are to inquire into the motives, the onus should be thrown on the prosecution to show that it was published with bad motives. It is a principle established in law, and is right, that the prosecutor should show the bad or malicious motives.

Mr. HANSCOM believed the principle laid down in the old constitution, and reported by the committee, was the best. The old doctrine, the greater the truth the greater the libel, was exploded. The truth constitutes a defence absolutely in civil proceedings. The last clause applies altogether to criminal prosecutions. The object is to throw around the private citizen and the public a shield against the stirring up of contention by the publication of scandalous reports. It is as easy to excite controversy, and to produce results tending to dueling, assaults and batteries, by the publication of truth, as falsehood. The object of the provision in the constitution is to preserve the public peace.

In the modification of the constitutions of the several states within the last few years, they have not departed from that principle. He hoped the principle would be sustained by this Convention, and embodied in the constitution.

Mr. BEARDSLEY was in favor of striking out the words, as proposed by the amendment. It would be more conducive to the rights of men than the present clause. How is it possible to show a man's motives, his good or his bad intentions, unless his own testimony is admitted. No man can swear to the intention of the heart except himself. In order to do justice, if the amendment is not made, it will be necessary to make him a witness in his own defence.

Mr. McLEOD did not see the force of the objection made by the gentleman who last spoke. The question of intent was a question of fact, and was inferable from the circumstances under which the alleged libellous matter was uttered. We cannot, of course, withdraw the veil, and press into the thousand mysteries of the human heart in search of motives. All we can do is to listen to the details of the case, as presented by the testimony of witnesses; and from these details to infer the motive which prompts the publication. It is entirely in accordance with the whole tenor of legal adjudication, that the gravamen of the offence consisted in the animus in quo, the disposition in which the offence was committed, rather than in the mere matter itself. It is a maxim of divine wisdom that the "fool uttereth all his mind, but the wise man keepeth it till afterwards." The truth may be rendered even more mischievous than a falsehood. And if mischievous truth be uttered, I am in favor of a provision that will throw upon the utterer the burden of proof, that it was done from a good motive and with a justifiable end.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Although it may appear that the matter published is true, yet it is assumed it was done from bad motives, and becomes a crime; but in this case, the strangest thing ever known is that after the thing is proved to be true, it is required that the motives must be shown to be good, or the person may be punished. He (Mr. R.) would have it so that the onus should be thrown on the prosecution, requiring them to show that it was done with bad intent. The question of motives must be decided by circumstances and facts. If it is true, it ought always to be an assumption of law that it was published with good motives. If facts and circumstances be shown that it was not so, the burden of proof should be thrown on the prosecution.

Mr. SULLIVAN had supposed the law to be that the truth being proved in justification, it would be assumed to be from good motives, and, unless the publication was shown to be from bad motives, an acquittal would be had. It appeared to him that it ought to be prima facie, conclusive; and that the burden of showing bad motives should be thrown on the prosecution.

Mr. J. BARTOW would ask if it was not already provided "that every person may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right." The legislature may provide for punishment. Why single out this matter of libel and make it an exception? requiring a person to show that his motives were good. With good motives a man may mistake his ends. He must still contend that the truth should be a justification, and if anything further was necessary, the legislature have power to fix the punishment.

The motion did not prevail.

Section 8. The person, houses, papers and possessions of every individual shall be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures; and no warrant to search any place, or to seize any person or things shall issue without describing them, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation.

Mr. N. PIERCE moved to insert, after the word "papers," the word "property."

Mr. HANSCOM—The word "possessions" covers the meaning of the word "property." Motion lost.

Mr. HANSCOM proposed to amend by striking out the word "unreasonable," and by adding after the word "seizures," "except pursuant to authority of law."

Mr. H. said he offered the amendment by reason of the fact that in other States, and in our own State, the word "unreasonable" has had different constructions. From the very character of the word used, it being liable to various constructions, there is no use in retaining it. The term "except pursuant to authority of law," is more legal in its form and more adapted to the adjudication of courts.

Mr. BACKUS said he would suggest that perhaps there might be difficulty, and much doubt grow out of the use of the words proposed to be inserted by the member from Oakland. The bill of rights is intended as a declaration of abstract principles of fundamental rights, never intended to be parted with by the people to any of the departments of government, legislative, executive or judicial. He asked if it would not be much better to retain the present word "unreasonable," which has a definite legal significance, and free from any of the doubts the words proposed to be inserted would introduce. Would the member propose to authorize the unlimited exercise of power by the legislature to enact laws which should warrant the arbitrary and unreasonable seizure and arrest of any person at the mere will of the legislature? If so, we had better at once sanction, in clear words, a despotism, and abandon a constitutional government. Suppose the legislature by law makes provision for seizures and arrests in a manner conflicting with other parts of the Constitution, could there be no arrests or seizures, until such provisions were made as were in conformity with the Constitution, we had better leave an old and well defined term alone.

Mr. HANSCOM was opposed to incorporating in the bill of rights, or any article of the Constitution, those undefinable terms, such as "excessive bail," "unusual punishments," &c. It seemed to him to involve absurdity on its face; it was a species of verbiage without any real or beneficial effect on the action of courts. All those terms which have no meaning, or vary from day to day, are unnecessary, and improper to be incorporated in the Constitution.

The question was taken on the amendment and lost.

Section 9. The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate; but a jury trial may be waived by the parties in all cases, in manner to be prescribed by law; and the legislature may authorize trial by jury of a less number than twelve men in all courts.

Mr. McLEOD moved to strike out all after the word "law."

Mr. McL. said the first line guarantees the inviolability of trial by jury. The last clause gives a dangerous power to the legislature to negative that right.

If the institution of trial by jury be valuable, it is not proper to leave it to the discretion of the legislature. He (Mr. McL.) considered it dangerous so to do.

Mr. CHURCH should vote against the proposed amendment. He thought the legislature should have the power to prescribe a less number than twelve as a jury in civil cases. If the gentleman would confine it to criminal cases, he would go with him.

Mr. McLEOD—I will accept the proposition.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike out the words "all courts," and insert "inferior courts." He was opposed to a less number in the circuit courts.

Mr. KINGSLEY would ask the gentleman if he called the county court an inferior court.

Mr. McCLELLAND—We are going to abolish the county courts.

Mr. WITHERELL would inquire what was understood by inferior courts. All courts are inferior to the supreme court. The supreme court he hoped would have power to order trials at bar in important cases. It may be construed a justice's court; but it would be better to use some more definite term than "inferior courts."

Mr. McCLELLAND—We do not know what courts will be established by the Constitution. When the courts are established by the Constitution, we can alter the verbiage. At present the best word we can adopt is "inferior." It is merely to answer present purposes.

Mr. McLEOD—I suppose the distinction will be made in more definite terms when the courts are established. In the present case some of our courts are superior in some cases and inferior in others.

Mr. WITHERELL suggested the words "other than courts of record," which Mr. McLEOD accepted; and the section was amended by striking out "and," in the second line, and inserting "but," and adding at the end of the section "not of record."

Mr. WALKER moved further to amend by striking out "all," in third line, and by adding after "record," "and in civil causes in all courts."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG—It appeared to him a contradiction in terms, to say "all courts not of record," and then go on and say "in all courts."

Before the question was taken, the committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. Church,

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns, it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock.

On motion of Mr. GARDINER, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, (8th day,) June 11th.

The Convention was called to order at half past 8 o'clock.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

REPORTS.

Mr. McCLELLAND, from the committee on the legislative department, presented the following report.

ARTICLE —.

Legislative Department.

1. The legislative power shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives.

2. The number of Representatives shall never be less than sixty-four, nor more than one hundred, and shall be chosen for two years, and by single districts; the Senate shall consist of thirty-two members, and the Senators, two from each district, shall be elected for four years.

3. The Legislature shall provide by law for an enumeration of the inhabitants of this State in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-five, and at the end of every ten years thereafter; and at the first session after each enumeration so made, and also after each enumeration made by the authority of the United States, the Legislature shall apportion anew the Representatives and Senators among the several counties and districts according to the number of white inhabitants; which apportionment shall remain unaltered until the return of another enumeration.

4. The judge of probate, register, sheriff, clerk and treasurer of the county, in such counties as may be entitled to more than one member of the House of Representatives, shall assemble at such time and place as the Legislature shall prescribe, and divide their respective counties into representative districts, equal to the number of representatives to which such counties may severally be entitled by law, and shall cause to be filed in the offices of the Secretary of State and the clerks of their respective counties, a description of such representative district, specifying the number of each district, and the population thereof, according to the last preceding enumeration, as near as can be ascertained. Each representative district shall contain as nearly as may be an equal number of white inhabitants, and shall consist of convenient and contiguous territory; but no township shall be divided in the formation of representative districts.

5. At the first session of the Legislature, elected in conformity with this constitution, the Senators shall be divided by lot from their respective districts into two equal classes; the seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, and of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, so that one-half thereof shall be chosen biennially thereafter. No county shall be divided in the formation of senatorial districts.

6. Senators and Representatives shall be citizens of the United States, and be qualified electors in the respective counties and districts which they represent; and a removal from their respective counties or districts shall be deemed a vacation of their seats.

7. No person holding any office under the United States, or this State, (post masters, notaries public, and officers of militia and of townships excepted,) shall be eligible to or have a seat in either house of the Legislature.

8. Senators and Representatives shall, in all cases, except treason, felony or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest; nor shall they be subject to any civil process during the session of the Legislature, nor for fifteen days next before the commencement and after the termination of each session; and for any speech in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

9. A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may provide.

10. Each house shall choose its own officers, and shall determine the rules of its proceedings, and judge of the qualifications, elections and returns of its own members; and may, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected, expel a member; but no member shall be expelled a second time for the same cause, nor for any cause known to his constituents antecedent to his election; and the reason for such expulsion shall be entered upon the journal, with the names of the members voting on the question.

11. Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same, except such parts as may require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the request of one-fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal. Any member of either house shall have liberty to dissent from and protest against any act or resolution which he may think injurious to the public or an individual, and have the reason of his dissent entered on the journal.

12. In all elections by either or both houses, the votes shall be given viva voce; and all votes on nominations made to the Senate shall be taken by yeas and nays, and published with the journal of its proceedings.

13. The doors of each house shall be open, except when the public welfare shall require secrecy. Neither house shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than where the Legislature may then be in session.

14. Any bill may originate in either house of the Legislature.

15. Every bill passed by the Legislature shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor; if he approves it, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to that house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members present agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other house, by whom it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved also by two-thirds of all the members present in that house, it shall become a law; but in such case, the vote of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for or against the bill shall be entered on the journals of each house respectively; and if any bill be not returned by the Governor within ten days, Sundays excepted, after it has been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it; unless the Legislature, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall not become a law. But the Governor may approve and sign, and file in the office of the Secretary of State, within five days after the adjournment of the two houses, any act passed during the last five days of the session, in which case it shall become a law.

16. Every resolution to which the concurrence of the Senate or House of Representatives may be necessary, except in cases of adjournment, shall be presented to the Governor, and before the same shall take effect, shall be proceeded upon in the same manner as in the case of a bill.

17. The members of the Legislature shall receive for their services three dollars a day, for actual attendance, unless absent from sickness, for the first sixty days of the session of 1851, and for the first forty days of every subsequent session, and nothing more. When convened in extra session by the Governor, they shall receive three dollars a day for the first twenty days, and no more; and shall legislate on no other subjects than those expressly stated in the Governor's proclamation. They shall also receive ten cents for every mile they shall actually travel in going to or returning from their places of meeting, on the usually traveled route; and for stationery and newspapers not exceeding five dollars for each member during any session.

18. The legislature may provide by law for the payment of all mailable matter received by the members, Lieutenant Governor and Speaker, but not for any sent or mailed by them.

19. The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall, in virtue of their offices, receive an additional compensation equal to one-third of the per diem allowance of members; but the President pro tempore of the Senate shall receive no additional compensation, except when the Lieutenant Governor shall not be paid for officiating as President of the Senate.

20. No member of the Legislature shall receive any civil appointment within this State, or to the Senate of the United States, from the Governor, the Governor and Senate, from the Legislature or any other state authority, during the term for which he shall have been elected; and all such appointments, and all votes given for any such member for any such office or appointment, shall be void; nor shall any member of the Legislature be interested, either directly or indirectly, in any contract with the State, or any county thereof, authorized by any law passed during the time for which he shall have been elected, or during one year after the expiration thereof.

21. The Governor shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies as may occur in the Senate and House of Representatives.

22. All bills and joint resolutions shall be read three times in each house before the final passage thereof; and no bill or joint resolution shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of all the members elect in each house; and on the final passage of all bills, the vote shall be by ayes and noes, and shall be entered on the journal.

23. Every law shall embrace but one object, which shall be expressed in its title; and no public act shall take effect or be in force until the expiration of ninety days from the end of the session at which the same may be passed, unless, in case of emergency, the Legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each house, shall otherwise direct.

24. The Legislature shall never grant or authorize extra compensation to any public officer, agent, servant or contractor, after the service shall have been rendered or the contract entered into.

25. The Legislature shall provide by law that the fuel and stationery furnished for the use of the State, the printing and binding the laws and journals, and all other printing ordered by the Legislature, shall be let by contract to the lowest bidder or bidders, who shall give adequate and satisfactory security; and it shall not be competent for the Legislature to rescind or alter such contract, or to release the person or persons taking the same, or his or their sureties from the performance of any of the conditions of the contract; and no member of the Legislature, or other officer of the state, shall be interested, either directly or indirectly, in any such contract.

26. The Legislature shall have power to exclude from the privilege of voting and being elected to office, any person convicted of bribery, forgery, or other infamous crime.

27. The Legislature shall have no power to authorize, by private or special law, the sale of any lands or other real estate belonging in whole or in part to any individual or individuals.

28. It shall be competent for either house to elect a chaplain, who shall receive for his services two dollars a day.

29. No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title, but every act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length.

30. Divorces shall not be granted by the Legislature; and no lottery shall be authorized, nor shall the sale of lottery tickets be permitted.

31. No new bill shall be introduced into either house during the last three days of the session, unless by the unanimous consent of the house in which it originates.

32. In case of contested elections, the person only shall receive per diem compensation or mileage, who is declared by the house in which the contest takes place to be entitled to a seat.

33. No person who may hereafter be a collector, or holder of public moneys, shall have a seat in either house of the Legislature, or be eligible to any office of trust or profit under this State, until he shall have accounted for and paid into the treasury all sums for which he may be liable.

34. The Legislature shall not audit or allow any private claim or account, but shall provide for their reference to a board of auditors or other tribunal, for adjudication and allowance.

35. Whenever the Legislature fixes upon the day of adjournment, they shall adjourn at 12 o'clock at noon of that day.

36. The Legislature shall meet on the first Monday in January next, and every two years thereafter, and at no other period, unless as provided by this constitution.

37. The elections of Senators and Representatives, pursuant to the provisions of this constitution, shall be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November in the year 1851, and every two years thereafter.

38. The style of the laws of this state shall be, "The People of the State of Michigan enact."

Mr. McCLELLAND said it had been his intention to explain the reasons that had governed the committee in the various modifications proposed—but an unexpected occurrence called him home, and he could only present the report this morning.

Mr. WITHERELL thought this a very important report. He moved that five hundred extra copies be printed.

Mr. WALKER suggested four hundred and eighty. They had learned something yesterday about printing.

Mr. COOK suggested double the usual number.

It was accepted by the mover, but the motion was lost.

Mr. BAGG, from a majority of the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the 8th inst., directing an inquiry into the expediency of inserting a clause in the constitution authorizing the sale of ardent spirits without license, &c., submitted the following report, to be an additional section to the article reported by Mr. McCLELLAND:

39. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act to grant any license for the sale of ardent spirits or other intoxicating liquors as a drink or beverage.

Mr. B. stated that the committee had thought proper not to incorporate that section in the article already reported, as the committee had been unanimous in adopting it, but to make a separate report of the matter. In adopting the report which he submitted, the committee stood seven to one. The reports were ordered printed and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. SULLIVAN, from the committee on impeachments and removals from office, reported

ARTICLE —.

Impeachments and removals from office.

1. The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeaching civil officers of the State, for corrupt conduct in office, or for crimes and misdemeanors; but a majority of all the members elected shall be necessary to direct an impeachment.

2. All impeachments shall be tried by the Senate. When the Governor or Lieutenant Governor shall be tried, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court shall preside. Before the trial of an impeachment, the members of the court shall take an oath or affirmation, truly and impartially to try and determine the charge in question according to the evidence; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. Judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office, but the party convicted shall be liable to indictment and punishment according to law.

3. The House of Representatives shall elect from their own body three members, whose duty it shall be to prosecute impeachments. No impeachment shall be tried until the Legislature shall have adjourned sine die; when the Senate shall proceed to try such impeachment.

4. No judicial officer shall exercise his office after he shall have been impeached, until he shall be acquitted.

5. The Executive may make a provisional appointment to fill the vacancy occasioned by the suspension of an officer, until he shall have been acquitted, or until after the election and qualification of a successor.

6. For any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for the impeachment of the judges of any of the courts, the Governor shall remove any of them on an address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature; but the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in the address.

7. The Legislature shall provide by law for the removal of justices of the peace, and other county, township and school district officers, in such manner and for such cause as to them shall seem just and proper.

Referred to committee of the whole and ordered printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were adopted:
On motion of Mr. EATON,

Resolved, That the committee on finance and taxation be instructed to inquire into the propriety of engrafting the following provision in the constitution: "that all bonds, mortgages, judgments, and all other evidences of debt which are liens on real estate, shall not be taxed as personal property, and that all real estate shall be taxed to the owner or occupant at its fair value, and that any person or persons owning or holding any bond, mortgage, judgment, or any other evidence of indebtedness which are liens on real estate, shall be liable to the person or persons to whom the same shall have been taxed for his, her or their proportion of said tax, in proportion to the interest he, she or they may have held or owned in such real estate.

Mr. EATON offered the resolution from a knowledge of the fact that the law, as it now stands, operated unequally and unjustly. Taxes were paid on real estate in many cases by the person having, in fact, but a small interest in the land, while persons holding liens to a large amount on the same property escaped taxation. He wished them to bear the taxes in proportion to the interest of each.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

Resolved, That the committee on impeachments and removals from office be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the trial and determination of impeachments and charges against officers, involving their removal, in some court of judicature.

By Mr. COMSTOCK:

Resolved, That the committee on the militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of incorporating into the constitution of this State, a provision exempting from militia duty any inhabitant of this State, of any religious denomination whatever, who, from scruples of conscience, is averse to bearing arms, upon such condition as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. WHITE offered the following:

Resolved, That the Auditor General of this State be, and he is hereby requested to furnish for the use of this Convention, a statement of the annual expenses of the State government since its organization. That such statement embrace a list of the State officers, the number of clerks and other persons employed by them respectively in each year, and the salary or compensation paid to each; also the annual expenditure of the several departments of government, Executive, Judicial and Legislative. That the Auditor General be requested to furnish to the Convention a statement of the annual amount of State tax apportioned to be paid by each county; the yearly amount of delinquent or unpaid taxes returned to the Auditor's office from the several counties, and showing the amount of the original tax levied, the amount of interest which accrued thereon, the amount of office fees and other contingent expenses, if any, charged to said tax, and the amount of taxes rejected, with interest, &c., which have been charged back to the respective counties in each year.

Mr. BUSH was of the opinion that all the information sought in the resolution could not be obtained; but if the Auditor General could furnish it in twenty days, he would have no objection to the resolution. He would suggest to the gentleman [Mr. WHITE,] to permit the resolution to lay on the table until it was ascertained whether the information could be had.

The resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS,

Resolved, That the committee on towns and counties be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the constitution, that no county or counties, township or city, shall be liable for the expense of laying out or establishing any road or roads, authorized by special act of the Legislature.

On motion of Mr. FRALICK,

Resolved, That the committee on militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the enrollment of all persons liable to military duty, and the abolition of militia trainings, except those of independent companies.

Mr. ORR offered the following:

Resolved, That the judiciary committee be requested to inquire into the expediency of reporting a constitutional provision dispensing with the present law on evidence, which now governs in our courts of justice.

Mr. WELLS asked that the resolution be read again. [It was read.] Ah! He understood it when first read to dispense with "all law and evidence."

The resolution was lost.

Mr. McLEOD offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the seat of government be instructed to report on to-morrow the permanent location of the capital at Lansing.

Mr. BAGG offered a substitute for the foregoing:

Resolved, That the committee on the location of the capital be instructed to report a distinct article in the constitution, to be referred to the people, locating the capital permanently at the city of Detroit.

Mr. KINGSLEY stated that the committee were ready to report. The report contained only three lines.

Laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. BURNS,

Resolved, That the committee on county offices and county government be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a constitutional provision, that no county seat shall be removed until the place to which it is proposed to be removed shall be fixed by law, and a majority of two-thirds of the voters of the county voting on the question have voted in favor of its removal.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH,

Resolved, That the daily sessions of the Convention shall commence at 8 o'clock A. M., until otherwise ordered.

Mr. EATON submitted the following:

Resolved, That when this Convention

adjourns, it adjourn to meet again at three o'clock this afternoon; and that it will hold afternoon sessions, commencing at 3 o'clock each day, until further ordered by the Convention.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped the resolution would not be adopted. It would retard the progress of business, as the committees were engaged in the afternoons preparing their reports.

Mr. EATON thought the Convention might be engaged during the afternoon in considering the reports already made.

The resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WOODMAN offered the following:

Whereas, The chairman of the committee on the punishment of crimes, [Mr. WITHERELL,] refuses to act as their chairman;

And whereas, No member of said committee feels at liberty to act as chairman; therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on the punishment of crimes be discharged.

Mr. W. said he offered the resolution that the Convention might know in what situation the committee was.

Mr. HANSCOM said the committee could go on and elect a chairman. That was the usual proceeding in such a case.

The resolution was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. BACKUS,

Resolved, That the committee on towns and counties be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the constitution authorizing the erection of any city into a separate county government, without regard to the territorial extent of such county.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the Bill of Rights, Mr. BRITAIN in the chair.

JURIES.

Mr. WALKER'S amendment to section 9 being under consideration, it was modified by him so as to read as follows:

Amend section 9 by striking out all after the word "law," in second line, and inserting "but the legislature may authorize a trial by jury of a less number than twelve men for the trial of misdemeanors and civil cases."

Mr. GOODWIN moved to amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof, "in courts held by justices of the peace."

Mr. KINGSLEY offered the following substitute to section 9: "The trial by jury shall remain inviolate; but a party requiring a jury shall demand and pay for the same as the law shall provide; and the legislature may provide that a less number than twelve may constitute a jury."

Mr. K. said he would state his object in offering the substitute. By the section as it now reads, a jury must be had unless waived by the parties, and both parties would never waive the trial by a jury. When parties go to law, they are not disposed to accommodate each other—what one wants the other will not have, even if he wants it. He was willing a party should have a jury in all cases where he required it, but it would be no hardship to demand a jury, and pay for it such sum as the law may require.

If a party is required to call for a jury, and pay for it when he wants it, a jury will not be called for in one case in ten; and much less frequently would a jury of twelve men be called for, if it should be provided that a less number than twelve may constitute a jury. Experience has shown this, that trial by a jury of twelve men has lost its charm. The reason which made it so valuable in England in days gone by, do not exist here. There it was thought a great privilege for a party to be tried by his peers, to protect him against the oppression of the judge; in this country we are all peers; the judge is within our reach. He can be reached by the press, by public opinion, and above all, by the ballot box, which will restrain him from acts of injustice. When parties desire to settle their matters of difference amicably, by leaving it to a tribunal of their own choosing to decide, they know that three men are sufficient to do justice between them—they never choose five or seven, and much less twelve. Indeed, juries of twelve men are now more called for to defeat justice than to obtain it. In a bad case an attorney thinks he stands a better chance to succeed with a jury, and the larger the better. He would prefer twelve to six, and twenty four would be a still better number.

Mr. K. said he would not object to a jury in any case where a party required it to guard him against the oppression, partiality or ignorance of the judge, or when he thought his interest required it from any cause; but it is not unreasonable to require a party to demand a jury if he wants it, and to pay for it so much as the law may require.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he could not agree with the gentleman from Washtenaw. He was of the opinion that the right of trial by jury should not only remain inviolate, but be insured under all circumstances—that all cases, civil as well as criminal, should be tried by a jury, unless waived by both parties. The honest suitor, he thought, was always more sure of justice at the hands of a jury than those of a judge or justice. The opinion that law was a tissue of quibble prevailed to a great extent; and some justices of the peace seemed to believe that they possessed no equitable discretion, and consequently their decisions were often against both law and equity; for they misapprehended the one and rejected the other as inconsistent with their duties. He had known great injustice to be done in a late case, as he believed, by a justice's misapprehension of his duty. A plaintiff in a suit before him had the defendant sworn in order to make him a witness against himself, (the defendant,) but on reflection declined asking him a question. The court, however, allowed the defendant's counsel to examine him by way of cross examination, as to the accounts he claimed against the plaintiff, and as to the whole matter in controversy, and insisted that he was bound by law to receive the testimony of defendant as truth, against plaintiff, (even if he did not believe a word of it,) defendant having been sworn as a witness for the plaintiff; as he (Mr. B.) was informed, the justice admitted that he did not believe the testimony of the defendant, and indeed he could not; for it was too evidently untrue by its inconsistency; and besides, there was the positive and circumstantial evidence of some two or three unimpeachable witnesses against it.

Mr. B. said he alluded to this case merely to show that justices of the peace, sometimes at any rate, considered themselves bound down by a rule of law that militated against justice, and sometimes, too, mistake law. The sentiment that little or no equitable discretion belongs to a justice of the peace, (notwithstanding he acts in the double capacity of judge and juror,) he believed to be very prevalent.

In his county the justices were a very sensible and respectable body, and so far as he could judge, these officers were well chosen throughout the state; but it required some acquaintance with the principles of law to discriminate legally. The best lawyers, and even judges, met with difficulties, having resource to their libraries. Few justices of the peace had the opportunities of becoming acquainted with the principles of law; and if the idea that justice cannot be ordinarily certain through the medium of a single justice of the peace, and that ideal technicalities prevent such a result, be correct, then juries are necessary for the ends of justice.

Mr. CRARY—Mr. President, this section 9 may be understood, or not. I will explain. The first part of the clause is taken from the old constitution. The second part is from the constitution of the state of New York, and is in accordance with our present existing law. The third part is taken from the constitution of Iowa, with the exception of the words "all courts." The constitution of Iowa gives the right of a jury of a less number than twelve, only in inferior courts.

In changing our government from a territorial to a state form, we preserved the right of trial by jury inviolate. In consequence of that fact, a question has heretofore been raised whether a jury of six in a justices court, in civil causes, was constitutional. The clause now introduced removes all questions in regard to such a jury, and enables the legislature to authorize a jury of a less number than twelve, for the trial of criminal causes in justices' courts. Public convenience seems to require that the exercise of this discretion should be left to the legislature.

Mr. S. CLARK stated that the section was drawn as proposed by the member from Lenawee, Mr. TIFFANY. It was not in accordance with his own views.

Mr. GALE said if a less number than twelve was sufficient to try a cause in inferior courts, why not apply the rule to superior courts? Reasoning from analogy, it would seem to require the greater number in inferior courts, where there was supposed to be more ignorance, and not in the supreme courts where there was most learning.

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the section

(9) be passed over. He said it was important, and would probably lead to a lengthy debate.

The section was so passed.

Mr. S. CLARK then moved to amend section 10 by adding: "Nor shall any person be held to answer for a criminal offence, unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases of impeachment, or in cases cognizable by justices of the peace, or arising in the army or militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Mr. C said it would be seen upon an examination that the amendment proposed by him was section 11 of the old bill of rights, which the committee had stricken out. He did not propose, at this time, to assign all the reasons why he was opposed to striking out this provision—he would briefly state some few considerations by which he was governed.

One of the principal objections urged against the grand jury is the expense. This, sir, (said Mr. C.,) I consider not well founded. If gentlemen will reflect, they will find that by abolishing the grand jury, and throwing their duties into other hands, the expense must be vastly increased. In complaints made before the grand jury, bills are not found in more than one-half or one-third of the cases. Do away the grand jury, have your examinations before magistrates, and the expenses would double those now incurred; there would be three cases tried to one now. The bills of justices of the peace incurred in criminal business in the most populous counties are very large, and in the whole state amount to an enormous sum.

But there are other considerations more important. The good effect in the restraint of crime, the tendency to prevent offences, is above the question of expense. It is well known to every one, that an able charge to a grand jury, delivered in an impressive and solemn manner by a learned judge, has much weight and influence upon a community.

But, sir, there is great complaint in reference to the discharge of their duties by grand jurors. This may be the case in some instances,—it may be they are not properly selected—that unfaithful and incompetent persons are chosen—yet, it is only an abuse of the system which may be corrected, and we have the power to correct it here. It can be done by electing the grand jurors in the townships, or by selecting the oldest justices; or we can resort to some other mode; and let us do so if the present mode does not work well.

I, sir, consider the proposition to abolish the grand jury far from being a reform, to be a dangerous innovation; and I call upon its advocates to answer how they will get over the difficulty, in reference to the crimes committed by persons residing on the borders of our state. What remedy do they propose to prevent the depredations of the gangs of horse thieves and counterfeiters committed upon citizens of the state? How are they to be reached? How brought to justice?

It is proposed to abolish the grand jury, so that no indictment can be found on which to base a requisition. By the constitution of the United States, a person charged with crime and fleeing from justice, shall, upon requisition, be delivered up to the authorities of the state from which he fled. And how charged? Is a simple affidavit, stating the defendant's belief that the accused is guilty, sufficient? or should the fact be positively charged, so that the executive authority may be sure an offence has been committed? I do not, sir, at this moment, recollect but two cases in which a requisition issued upon a simple affidavit; the one was the case of a bank officer in the state of Rhode Island, arrested in the state of New York, and held to be properly charged; the other the case of the prophet, Joe Smith, arrested in Illinois, and after a hearing before Judge Pope, upon the return to a writ of habeas corpus, he was discharged on the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit on which the requisition was based.

What rule then is to be adopted in regard to the numerous class of cases to which I have alluded? They are beyond the jurisdiction of your state courts, and no positive evidence on which to base a requisition, and no way to obtain the requisite evidence except through the instrumentality of a grand jury.

But there is another and higher consideration why the proposed change should not be made. I would not entrust in the hands of incompetent prosecuting attorneys this power. It would be taking away the rights of citizens and placing them at the mercy of one or two individuals—the right to have his case first investigated by a grand jury, requiring twelve of their number to find a bill, is guaranteed to every citizen—the very number of the grand jury being also a guaranty against bribery and malicious prosecutions. As I before stated, I consider the proposition to abrogate this right of the citizen, a hazardous and dangerous innovation.

But there is another consideration to be taken in view. Michigan will be the only state in the Union that has yet dared to venture on the experiment of abolishing the grand jury. She has not a single precedent to justify her in taking the step proposed. Connecticut has gone further than any other state in dispensing with a grand jury, confining its duty to the consideration of higher offences. I am not influenced by precedent, yet in the absence of reason, precedent should have due weight. For these reasons, I am entirely opposed to the proposition to dispense with grand juries.

Mr. SULLIVAN said that having had some experience in criminal proceedings, and being satisfied that the sentiment of his constituents was in favor of abolishing the institution of the grand jury, he would occupy the attention of the Convention for a few moments with some remarks on the subject.

Mr. S. said he was not, more than any other man, in favor of putting a person on trial, unless there was probable cause to believe him guilty. He would have no man tried for an aggravated crime, unless a complaint in writing, and under oath, had been made to a magistrate, and an opportunity given to the accused to defend himself. The magistrate should then proceed to hear the allegations and evidence on the part of the prosecution, and the accused; and if probable cause was found to believe him guilty, a certificate to that effect should be made to the prosecuting officer, which should form the basis of an information, to be filed against the accused.

This, said Mr. S., was the project he would propose as a substitute for a grand jury. He would commit no power or discretion, more than the prosecuting officer now possesses, into that officer's hands; who, as has been remarked, might be incompetent or dishonest. Let him be competent or incompetent, honest or dishonest, his only power would be what it now is—to draw up the accusation and conduct the trial.

The institution of a grand jury, as had been remarked, was an ancient one, and gave pomp and dignity to judicial proceedings. In this, the main difficulty of overthrowing it consisted. It was not easy to overcome our veneration for its antiquity, or our respect for the imposing forms connected with it. The imagination clung to it when the judgment had pronounced it worthless.

But, said Mr. S., the institution is an expensive one. A grand jury cannot be assembled from various quarters of a county, and remain in session for a few days even, without very serious expense. It had been remarked by the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. CLARK,] that the expense of proceedings, under the proposed system, would be equal to that of the present one. The facts must be otherwise; for in the first place, you have now, in a great majority of cases, to encounter the expense of both tribunals. When a man committed theft, or robbery, or murder, people did not wait for the session of the grand jury to arrest him. He was complained of, examined, bound over or committed to jail; and finally the case re-examined before the grand jury.

In the second place, said Mr. S., the evidence being introduced on both sides before a magistrate, the strong probability was, that under the proposed system, we should have to encounter the expense of trying a much smaller number of innocent men than under the other. A much smaller number of complaints would be made under the proposed system, than under the existing laws. Men went before the grand jury to make light and frivolous accusations, which they would not dare to make in the face of day. They went there to gratify their malevolence—to pull down the honest reputation of a neighbor. They thought they might perhaps convict—if they did not, the infamy of the accusation clung to him, and the accused never occupied the same high platform in society as one who had never been suspected. Many complaints were therefore made, as had been remarked, which were not sustained; and most of them would never have been made before a magistrate.

It had been said that the accused might escape into a neighboring state, and could not be brought back—a requisition could not be obtained without the intervention of a grand jury. The case, said Mr. S., presented no difficulty. If a criminal escaped, the remedy was clearly marked out by the laws of the United States. No indictment was necessary—a requisition could be obtained on proper affidavit.

He was opposed to the institution because it was a secret one. It was an anomaly in judicial proceedings. The publicity of courts afforded the best guaranty of their purity. Because, if prejudice, or partiality, or corruption existed, the world would see the indications of it. But in the grand jury room, like the inquisitions of the star chamber, all was enveloped in darkness.

He was further opposed to the institution, because under it the accused could not expect an examination in conformity with the rules of law. He was examined by men, generally substantial and intelligent, but who did not possess, and had too much good sense to pretend to possess, a large amount of legal knowledge. Hearsay evidence, parol evidence of the contents of records, and other irregularities were naturally to be expected.

The grand jurors, said Mr. S., were selected almost at random from the mass of their fellow citizens; the magistrates were elected with a view to their knowledge of judicial affairs. Again, the proposed system was vastly better for the accused. He might confront his accusers and cross-examine witnesses; he had the means provided to enable him to prepare for trial. Circumstances that appeared dark and suspicious upon their face, he might, perhaps, be ready to explain.

Mr. S. appealed to the intelligence of members of the Convention, whether, if they should be accused of any infamous crime—and there was no man so elevated that he might not unjustly be suspected—whether they would prefer a secret ex parte examination, or choose to hear the testimony, cross-examine and sift it, explain it if possible, learn the mode of attack to be made upon him and prepare to meet it? Would any member wish the grand jury system applied to himself in such a case? If not, why did he wish to furnish it to others?

If there was any tendency in the grand jury system to rescue an innocent man from the disgrace of a public accusation, it would be something in its favor; but the fact is otherwise. There was no secrecy except the modus operandi, the particular mode of conducting the proceedings in the grand jury room; about results there was none. The grand jury were sworn to secrecy, but the witnesses were not, and the mis-called secrets of the grand jury room were blazoned to the accused and the world.

We have been, said Mr. S., solemnly warned that we were stepping upon dangerous ground—that we proposed a great innovation—that no other state had gone to this extent. An innovation it certainly is, but one which had recommended itself to the judgment of the most substantial and practical men of the state, and had found distinguished advocates in some of the principal legal periodicals of the land. We were told that in this measure, if it succeeded, we should take the lead. And why should Michigan shrink from taking the lead in a great measure of reform? She had occupied that position before. She was among the first to abolish imprisonment for debt: she was among the earliest to pass a homestead exemption law. Would she wish to blot these facts from the page of her history? No! they were and always would be regarded by her with satisfaction and pride. Abolish this institution, and instead of being a source of mortification and disgrace, he had no doubt that this also would be contemplated with just state pride.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE said: Mr. Chairman, I am decidedly in favor of abolishing the grand jury system, and I have no doubt the people of the state approve the measure. It is now a useless, burdensome institution. More men are blackened by it than are protected by its operation.

When first instituted it was of value. Then the king, by his fiat, could send the man to his creatures to be tried—to the dungeon, and to death. Then it was that the grand jury came up, and placed itself between the monarch and the subject. To the latter it afforded some protection.

But the occasion which gave it birth has passed away. We have no king to frown—to send a man to his court to be tried and executed. Besides, sir, the grand jury is a burdensome, useless expenditure—it is a waste of time and money, and there is no advantage resulting from this institution at all commensurate with its cost. The great purpose of it can be better obtained without than with its continuance. It is wholly ex parte in its action, and often works great injustice. A neighborhood quarrel is kept alive, and brooded over until the grand jury is convened, and then, perchance, the originator and perpetrator of the wrong may go forward and swear his neighbor under indictment.

The grand jury, sir, is more of the nature of an inquisition than any other institution of our country. The system is at war with the fundamental principles of liberty—that every person charged shall be at liberty to confront the witnesses. In the grand jury room this is denied. I go, therefore, for abolishing the system—for cutting it up, root and branch, trunk, twig and leaf.

Mr. HANSCOM said: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much surprise to the proposition to abolish the institution of the grand jury; and the arguments adduced in support of the proposed innovation upon the administration of criminal law, are, to me, of a most novel and extraordinary character.

I had supposed, sir, that the design and effect of a grand jury was to subserve the ends of public justice—to secure the prompt, efficient, impartial and independent administration of the laws of the land, and at the same time to guard the rights of the citizen and secure him against unfounded accusation. But we are gravely told by gentlemen on this floor, and even by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] that grand juries are engines of oppression, and tend to outrage private rights—create unnecessary expense, and hinder and delay the punishment of crime. Such arguments, coming from a gentleman of his extensive reading and general intelligence, could only be listened to with astonishment. I had supposed, sir, that grand juries were one of the shields thrown around the citizen to guard his life, liberty or property, upon the one hand; and upon the other, to insure the arrest, prosecution and punishment of real violators of the law. Such, sir, has been the opinion of mankind for centuries—such was the design of the Barons of England, when, sword in hand, they wrested from an arbitrary and tyrannical British monarch the great charter of British liberty. Sir, its objects and its effects, like the habeas corpus act, were to secure the citizen against the tyranny of the government; and the experience of centuries in England, and in our own country, has fully demonstrated the fact, that in its operations it has not only fully met the objects of its original creation, but has conducted, in an eminent degree, to prevent the commission of crime, as well as to insure the punishment of offenders.

But, sir, it is urged by gentlemen that it creates unnecessary expense. I, for one, do not believe it. Experience and observation convince me that in points of economy it is preferable, far preferable, to any plan proposed in its stead. Once abolish grand juries, and every conceivable case has to undergo a legal investigation and trial before a committing or examining magistrate, before the party charged can be put upon a final trial before a traverse jury. Grand juries obviate, to a great extent, such an evil; as it is only in the most aggravated cases, or when there is danger of the party charged escaping, that complaints are made and examinations had; and, sir, it will take but a few criminal examinations where counsel are employed, and witnesses called, and contests had, to create an amount of expense greater than is incurred by the entire sitting of a grand jury. Take any of the more populous counties of our state as an illustration. From twenty to fifty indictments may be found at a single term, and that term not extend beyond three or four days. In view of the meeting of this body no complaints have been made—no expense incurred, no criminal examinations had.

But, sir, there are considerations connected with this subject far more important than that of mere economy,—public security, the protection of the private citizen, the additional safeguard thrown around him, and the actual punishment of the real offender against the laws. Suppose, sir, an offence of the greatest magnitude is committed, and the offender goes beyond your jurisdiction—escapes to another state or a foreign government; what will you substitute for the indictment of a grand jury upon which you would predicate a requisition from your Executive upon the authorities of the foreign jurisdiction, to bring back the offender for trial and punishment?

But, sir, it is charged that the tribunal is a secret one, and that by its existence it is placed in the power of a vindictive and unscrupulous enemy to procure the indictment of the innocent. Such cases may have occurred, and doubtless have; but, I venture to say, not successfully occurred as often as have prosecutions of such a character before examining magistrates. As a general rule, the men composing our grand juries are possessed of sufficient intelligence and integrity to detect and counteract the designs of the malignant prosecutor or complainant. But, sir, is the substitute proposed (and the only one) free from still more serious—yes, ten fold more serious objections? A single magistrate, and he perhaps leagued in feeling and design with this vindictive complainant perhaps ignorant as well as knavish, binds over or commits the innocent citizen for trial. The public prosecutor has no discretion—the case must go to a court of record for trial, and the party charged is subjected to all the consequences that would follow an indictment found by a jury of his fellow citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I look upon this attempt to abrogate this time honored institution as a most dangerous innovation; and I am fearful that the consummation would be fraught with most evil consequences; and until something is proposed in lieu of it—some plan by which the great ends designed to be accomplished by grand juries, can be attained—I shall oppose their abrogation.

It is not unlikely that evils have grown up in connection with their organization that call for a correction; and none will be more ready than myself to aid in ridding the system of what is bad, and throwing every guard around it that shall be calculated to guard against abuses and prevent the possibility of negligence, as applied to the government, or of injustice towards the citizen.

Mr. H. moved to pass over the section, so that after the committee should report the article back to the Convention, he would move to recommit it to the committee with instructions so to amend the 9th section as to confer power on the legislature to provide by law for the trial of civil causes by a less number than twelve; and to authorize a jury of a less number than twelve in courts not of record, and for the trial of misdemeanors, in any court, by a number less than twelve.

Also, so to arrange the 10th and 11th sections, either by the substitution of an additional section, or otherwise, as to provide for indictments and presentment by grand juries in all cases where the offence charged would be punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Mr. CHURCH opposed the proposition. He believed the opinions of members had been matured on the subject, and they were ready then to vote on the question. If there was any one subject on which they agreed, it was not to sanction the present grand jury system.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE thought the question had as well be met then. There was no object in recommitting, or passing it by.

Mr. S. CLARK enquired to what committee it was proposed to recommit.

Mr. HANSCOM—The committee on the Bill of Rights.

Mr. S. CLARK said it would be useless, except under special instructions.

Mr. HANSCOM withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLARK's amendment, and lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND then moved to amend as follows:

Sec. 10. Line 3. Amend by striking out the words "and in all civil cases in which personal liberty may be involved, the trial by jury shall not be refused."

Mr. S. said that section 9 preserved the right of trial by jury inviolate, and if so, the words he proposed to strike from section 10, were mere surplusage.

The motion to strike out was lost.

Mr. TIFFANY moved to amend section 10, line 2, by striking out "to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

Mr. S. CLARK said, that proposition was before the committee. They considered it highly important that a party should have the privilege of confronting the witnesses. It was to get rid of the loose and dangerous way of taking depositions, which must grow out of the amendment. If a party were subjected to inconveniences, they were inconveniences in behalf of liberty.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. HASCALL moved to amend by adding at the end of the section, "nor shall any person be called to answer for any criminal offence on the presentment or indictment of any secret or ex parte tribunal."

Mr. CHURCH remarked that in the case of a fugitive from justice, the proceedings against him must necessarily be ex parte.

Mr. MORRISON, to avoid that difficulty, moved to amend the amendment by excepting the cases of fugitives from justice.

Mr. CRARY said he was not prepared at that time to vote for or against the proposition. By the vote already taken, the grand jury system was not abolished. All that had been decided was that future legislation should not be tied down by constitutional provisions. Under the constitution, as it now stood, the system had been cumbersome and expensive. It required the grand jury to have cognizance of too many offences.

By the action of the committee thus far, the question was left open to future legislation. If the committee wished to go further, all that was necessary was to introduce a naked proposition to abolish the grand jury. They might proceed without hesitation to do so, if such were the will of the people.

The institution had been called ancient and venerable. This was not so in its present form; and there was no institution so ancient, or so venerable, but he was ready to raze it to the ground, if upon careful examination it was found to be useless.

Action thus far had been safe—it was left to future legislation to abolish the system, or regulate it to meet the wants of the age and the demands of our institutions. If, however, the Convention wished to abolish, they could safely do so. It had been done to a great extent in some of the other states, and could be done in this, if the public sentiment is prepared for it. In all their action they should look around and see what their own wants demanded, and not go to other states for a rule of action, which would be totally inapplicable to the condition of the State.

The amendment was withdrawn by Mr. HASCALL, when

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to amend section 10, by adding the words "the institution of the grand jury is hereby abolished."

Mr. McLEOD said he wished to make an experiment. He moved the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Lost.

Mr. COOK moved to pass the section over. He wished to have further time to consider the matter, as it was of vast importance.

Several other members having expressed a desire to have time to consider the subject, section 10 was passed, and section 11 taken up.

Mr. CRARY moved to amend by striking out of line 1, all after the word "person," to and including the word "punishment," and inserting, "after acquittal, shall be tried for the same offence."

Mr. C. said he considered the language used in the section indefinite, and his amendment merely proposed language more definite and better understood.

The amendment offered by Mr. CRARY drew out some discussion as to the construction placed by the courts on the phrase "twice put in jeopardy;" when

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to amend the amendment by adding after the word "acquittal," the words "upon the merits."

On motion of Mr. DANIELS, the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

The Convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (9th day,) June 12.

The Convention met at 8 o'clock A. M., and was called to order by the President.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

Roll called, and members all present except Messrs. McCLELLAND and WHIPPLE, absent on leave.

The journal was approved.

REPORTS.

Mr. REDFIELD, from the committee on State officers, except the Executive, reported the following:

ARTICLE —.
Of State Officers.

1. There shall be a Secretary of State, Superintendent of Public Instruction, a State Treasurer, who shall be ex-officio Commissioner of the Land Office, an Auditor General, and an Attorney General, elected at each biennial general election, who shall hold their respective offices for the term of two years, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law.

2. The terms of office of the incumbents to be elected under the foregoing provisions, shall commence on the first day of January, 1852, and of every second year thereafter.

3. Whenever a vacancy shall occur in any of the above mentioned State offices, the Governor (by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, if in session,) shall fill the same by a temporary appointment, to continue until the office can be supplied by an election, at such time and in such manner as shall be provided for by law.

4. The Secretary of State, State Treasurer and Auditor General shall keep their offices at the seat of government, and shall constitute a Board of State Auditors, for the examination and adjustment of all claims against the State, not otherwise provided for by law, or specially referred by the Legislature to some other tribunal. And shall also constitute a Board of State Canvassers, for determining the result of all elections for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Judges and State Officers, and of such other elections as shall by law be referred to said board.

5. In all cases of two or more persons having an equal and the highest number of votes for any office, as canvassed by the Board of State Canvassers, the two Houses of the Legislature, in joint convention, shall choose one of said persons to fill such office; and in all cases where the determination of the Board of State Canvassers shall be contested, the two Houses, in joint convention, shall direct which person shall be deemed to have been duly elected.

6. Three inspectors of the State Prison shall be elected at the general election which shall be held next after the adoption of this Constitution, one of whom shall hold his office for two years, one for four years, and one for six years. The Board of State Canvassers shall, on the first Monday in January next succeeding such general election, meet at the Capitol and determine by lot which of said inspectors shall hold his office for two years, which for four years, and which for six years. And there shall be one elected at each general election thereafter, who shall hold his office for two years.

The article was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Mr. KINGSLEY, from the committee on the seat of government, submitted the following:

ARTICLE —.
Of the Seat of Government.

The seat of government of the State shall be in the township of Lansing in the county of Ingham, where it is now located.

And the same was read the first and second time by its title, and referred to the committee of the whole.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting appeals and certioraris, and of providing for new trials instead thereof; and also as to the propriety of making a second verdict or judgment in favor of a party final and irreversible in all cases.

On motion of Mr. CORNELL,

Resolved, That the committee on townships be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the offices of assessor, commissioners of highways, and directors of the poor; and empowering the Legislature to provide for the election of a supervisor, township clerk, and treasurer, who shall, together with the oldest justice of the peace, constitute the township board and board of elections, and who shall perform such other duties as shall be prescribed by law.

On motion of Mr. WELLS,

Resolved, That the committee on education be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a constitutional amendment which shall forever prevent the Legislature from enacting any law relating to the university and school lands, unless such law is general in its application and effect.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON,

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise be instructed to inquire into the expediency of incorporating in the Constitution the following provision: "that for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence during his attendance as a student of any seminary of learning."

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of "Article 1, Bill of Rights," Mr. BRITAIN in the chair.

Section 11 was then read—No person, for the same offence, shall be twice put in jeopardy of punishment. All persons shall, before conviction, be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offences, when the proof is evident or the presumption great, and the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

The CHAIR—The question is on the amendment, by Mr. BARTOW, to the amendment of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY.] The original section you have heard. The gentleman from Calhoun moves to strike out "for the same offence shall be twice put in jeopardy of punishment," and insert, "after acquittal for the same offence." To that amendment the gentleman from Genesee moves the following: After "acquittal," insert the words "upon the merits."

Mr. BARTOW, of Genesee—It seems to me that the amendment to the amendment is proper. The original words have a definite and well understood meaning, and cover all the ground assumed by the gentleman from Calhoun. If the amendment to the amendment is lost, we shall incur the charge of essentially changing the laws. It will permit a criminal to escape upon a mere technicality. We do not wish to make a law that should have this tendency. If the amendment to the amendment is adopted, we shall show to our courts that a mere technicality will not shield a criminal from a second trial.

Mr. FRALICK—I consider the language of the section, as it was reported, as nearly right. It is the language of the Constitution of the United States and of a large majority of the different States. We understand what it means. It has obtained a legal construction. It is what we want, as it conveys exactly our meaning. Now, by putting in new language, I care not how plain we may make it, it will not be settled until there has been adjudication upon it. People cannot tell what adjudication will be made upon any particular set of words, and as we know what this means why should we alter it? I therefore hope that the section will remain as it is.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WALKER—I believe that the original section, as expressed in the bill, is more explicit, and has a better settled meaning than the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON—If we adopt this amendment, it will be necessary to prove whether the case was tried upon the merits or not. Suppose that it was not a good indictment; that neither the Prosecuting Attorney, nor the court, nor the jury saw that there was any technical defect in the indictment, how shall it be known afterwards whether the case was tried upon its merits or not? By calling in counsel, or the bystanders, to show how the case was decided? And can this be called an improvement; or that it mends a matter that was before clear, by leaving it thus undefined and unascertained, as all would say the testimony of witnesses in such cases would be? Calling again the jury; having in effect a trial within a trial, to see whether the merits were really canvassed upon the former trial? And shall we change a well known rule of law for such a vague course? Is any thing gained by it? A gentleman said they are words not understood by the masses. I will at any rate vouch for the knowledge in that respect of the masses of Macomb. And, sir, it cannot be true, that in this age of progression, we should so far have retrograded as not to understand the use of a simple word in the English language? Where is the gentleman who will tell me that the word "acquittal" is better, or more easily understood, than the word in the original section? And sir, I was astonished, in the debate yesterday, to hear gentlemen use in explanation, the words used by the committee. They said by "acquittal," they meant that a person should not be tried again; that he should not be put again in jeopardy. Surely, sir, a word used as an explanation cannot be so hard to be understood as an original. It speaks very little in favor of the masses, to suppose that the use of a simple English word is a mystery; and there is surely intelligence to follow out the long, well settled construction which is found in our courts. You may simplify, until by that very attempt, probably, you introduce new rules. It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment ought not to prevail.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I would ask the gentleman from Macomb one question: If it has been so simple, so plain, why has it been necessary to have any adjudication upon the subject?

Mr. BEARDSLEY—I am opposed to the amendment as it now stands, with the amendment to the amendment engrafted. After a man is acquitted, unless we uproot fundamental principles, we cannot ask the courts to reverse their verdict. And I trust that this Convention will not uproot laws that are respected even under tyrannical governments. When an individual has been once tried, that he shall never again be put upon trial for the same offence, is a principle in all laws; and it is a pity, while we are boasting of our progressive freedom, that we should enact any law that would tend to perpetuate oppression. If it is so simple and plain, as the gentleman from Macomb remarks, why was it necessary to adjudicate upon it? And, if it required a legal explanation, then it cannot be plain to the people.

Now, sir, I think that every thing that we do, all the language that we use, should be so plain, that the man who runs may read. As the amendment to the amendment stands, I shall vote against it, but am in favor of the original amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN—I understand it to be conceded that the language of the amendment does not differ materially from the language of the original, and the only object proposed is, to introduce language that will be more distinctly understood.

Now, it being conceded that these two terms are precisely of the same signification, how can difficulty arise about parol testimony? It is idle to say that this language is clear and definite, when we have a multitude of decisions to give explanations and meanings.

We know that the meaning of the words has been questioned by the ablest lawyers of the land. No complaint is more common than that language is employed that is unintelligible, when other terms might easily be found that would obviate the difficulty. It is to meet this complaint that this amendment is proposed, and on that ground I shall support it.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would explain, that there has been no difficulty at any time with the lawyers, the clergy or laymen, with respect to the meaning of the original clause as reported.

What is "put in jeopardy?" It has been decided that a person was only put in jeopardy when the indictment under which he was tried was a good and valid indictment. If this amendment were adopted, would there not be the same necessity for adjudication on the words used there? It might defeat the end of justice. One man would construe it as meaning one thing, and another, another. An indictment might be quashed on the quibble of an officer, and the criminal might go unwhipped of justice. The construction of the meaning of the words used in the original is settled, but the new will have to be settled by a course of decisions.

Mr. CRARY said he had heard a great number of speeches on the amendment proposed. He wished a statement of the exceptions where a person is not put in jeopardy by being tried by a jury. He called on the gentlemen who opposed the amendment to name these exceptions. When named, they would show that the amendment was proper, and was at the same time expressed in words that all could understand. It was said that the old phraseology was easy to be understood, and yet so late as the year 1824, the Supreme Court of the United States had been called on to make a decision on the subject. After having two or three more decisions, all might be informed what it was to be twice put in jeopardy.

Several of the new constitutions had laid aside the old phraseology. He named among the number, Rhode Island, New Jersey and Iowa. Others retained the language, and as it was used in the constitution of the United States. He preferred the language of the amendment, and hoped it would be adopted. He, however, wanted the explanation of the delegate from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] of the words "twice put in jeopardy," and he would take his seat for the purpose of hearing it.

Mr. HANSCOM called for a division of the question.

The motion to strike out prevailed.

The question to insert was carried.

Mr. LOVELL moved to strike out "capital offences" and insert "murder and treason."

The amendment was carried.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would suggest that the words "writ of habeas corpus," in the third line, are obscure. I am satisfied the masses are unable to understand them, and wish some gentleman to explain them, as I feel incompetent to throw out any suggestions myself.

Mr. SKINNER moved that section eleven be amended by adding after the word "merits," the following: "Provided, however, that no acquittal or conviction on his own complaint, or at his instance, shall be a bar to a second trial and conviction for the same offence."

Mr. HANSCOM—The original section, with the many amendments, is so obscure that we cannot understand it.

Mr. SKINNER—I do not know that the phraseology is correct. My object was merely to prevent a sham trial. An offence is committed, and the criminal instigates a mock trial against himself—a small fine is imposed, perhaps, for a grave offence, and thus the ends of justice are defeated.

Mr. WITHERELL—There would have been no occasion to amend had the section stood as it did originally, because the word "jeopardy" covered the whole ground, and adjudications have been made upon it. We shall, by the method we are pursuing, require new adjudications upon new subjects. The courts have decided, again and again, that no prosecution upon a complaint of an individual himself, or at his instigation, will excuse him from an indictment for the offence. It may be necessary now to introduce it, as the amendments have been carried.

The amendment was lost.

Section 12. Every person has a right to bear arms for the defence of himself and the State.

Mr. BAGG moved to insert the word "white" between the words "every" and "person."

Mr. B. said—I move the amendment simply because I wish, so far as our sable population is concerned, under the operation of our laws, to keep them in their present sphere. I would extend to them benefits and charity, &c., &c., but I would not let them come into our civil, political, social, conjugal or connubial relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I would like to put one question. I know in Kalamazoo a native born citizen, a man of large possessions, who is a black man. Would you not put the means of self-defence in that man's hands? If a gang of kidnappers were to come into the State, would you deprive that man of the means of defending his home, his children and his property?

Mr. BAGG—There may be isolated cases of individuals to whom I would extend more liberality than to others, but must go on general principles, which are so extensive that I should have to forego them, as they cannot adapt themselves to isolated cases. This is a general principle which I look to. Colored people, negroes and Indians should not be allowed to bear arms with us. It will be made a pretext with them to get into other circles. I am for keeping them where they are, believing them to be a species at least one link beneath us. The moment you let them into the political circle, you open the social and every other circle. I trust the Convention will never leave out the word "white" in the organic law.

Mr. BUSH would ask the gentleman from Wayne if this was a new feature in the constitution.

Mr. CORNELL—This would take away his natural rights, the right of self-defence, which has never been given up.

Mr. McLEOD—There is an old Latin maxim, "satis est leoni prostrasse," which, translated, signifies it is quite sufficient for the lion to have conquered. He goes no further—he does not insult. This unfortunate class of people are thrown almost out of the protection of our laws. They are named with contumely and reproach.

They are not permitted to exercise the franchises which those who are distinguished from them by the mere accident of color exercise. It is sufficient that we, in our power, go thus far, without going still further and adding insult.

I know many, both among the Indians and negroes, who, in point of intelligence, virtue and personal appearance, in all that elevates the man above the brute, are at least equal to the delegate from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG.]

Mr. CROUSE would suggest the propriety of amending by striking out the word "person," and inserting the word "citizen."

Mr. WILLIAMS would ask the gentleman from Livingston [Mr. CROUSE] if he would not allow the women to defend themselves.

The amendment offered by Mr. BAGG did not prevail.

Mr. BAGG moved to strike out the words "and the State." In that article it would incorporate the colored population with our white citizens. He was opposed to obliging them to do military duty, and thus insinuate themselves among us.

The amendment was negatived.

Sec. 13. The military shall, in all cases, and at all times, be in strict subordination to the civil power.

Sec. 14. No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner prescribed by law.

Mr. S. CLARK moved to amend by inserting after the word "owner," the words "or occupant."

Mr. WITHERELL was opposed to the amendment, because it was unnecessary. It is always understood that the person occupying a house, so far as that is concerned, is the owner.

Mr. S. CLARK would leave out the necessity of such a construction, by making the language clear and explicit.

The motion prevailed.

Sec. 15 read.

Sec. 16. No bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall be passed.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD moved to amend by adding after the word "contracts," the words "or their remedies."

Mr. B. said he believed it was well understood that the Legislature had, from time to time, passed acts that have effected the remedies relating to contracts.

The remedy, if not the obligation of contracts, is effected if the Legislature shall pass any act changing the time of payment, and making the act applicable to existing contracts. The Legislature have, at different times, passed exemption and stay laws that have operated retrospectively; and the time of redemption upon mortgage sales has been repeatedly changed, and he [Mr. B.] believed the courts had decided that the law applied as well to mortgages existing at the time of the passage of the act, as to those subsequently executed. He proposed that any alteration in the laws relating to the collection of debts, as in any way effecting contracts, should have a prospective effect. Otherwise, where is the safety of the parties to a contract, if the Legislature shall be permitted to step in and say that any part of the remedy may be changed. The remedy should be as sacred as the obligation of the contract itself; and yet, our Legislatures have acted upon the principle, that if the obligation of a contract remained the same, they were at liberty to make any change in the remedy that their wisdom or interest might dictate. He [Mr. B.] wished by this amendment to prevent such vacillating legislation in future.

The amendment did not prevail.

Mr. BUSH proposed to amend by inserting after the word "contract," "or retrospective exemption law."

Mr. WITHERELL did not know how far that language would extend; whether beyond the 16th section or not; and whether it would not require some adjudication as to the meaning of "exemption." It is not a term known to our ancient laws.

Mr. BACKUS had no doubt but some such provision as that intimated, would be extremely desirable, to render plain the position the Legislature holds in relation to contracts or remedies; but the one passed upon, and the one before the Convention, must be subject to serious objections. No doubt the present construction of the article contained in the Bill of Rights in our constitution, as well as similar provisions in the constitutions of other States, and the constitution of the United States, is, that it comes within the purview and scope of the constitution of the United States, that the several Legislatures shall not have the power to impair the obligation of contracts. The Supreme Court holds that it is a part of the constitution of the United States.

That our constitution should declare something of the kind, is necessary. Although the Legislature might pass such laws, the courts could not give them effect so as to impair the remedy of a contract made under a given law. The proposition under consideration appeared subject to some objections. If modified, he [Mr. B.] would cheerfully go for it.

Mr. BUSH—My attention was drawn to the subject by the amendment which was voted down. I sent up the resolution merely that this Convention might establish the principle, and in some way cover the views which I wish to express. It is true, sir, that the supreme court has established a principle with regard to retrospective laws; but what has been the action of the Legislature of Michigan? Have not such laws been passed from time to time? The exemption law of 1842 was retrospective. Since that time, even the remedy which was reserved for the creditors has been taken away. The character of the legislation of the State has been contrary to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. And my object in introducing this resolution is, that I wish it to be distinctly understood that if such laws are passed, they are passed right in the face of the constitution; and I want this pointed out so clearly that none can mistake.

Mr. WITHERELL—I think the language of the original section is not sufficiently explicit. In the first place, it says "no bill of attainder." Well, what is a bill of attainder? It was a power which the British parliament possessed, by which by an act, they could seize and hang a man—probably draw and quarter him—without any trial at all—without a hearing, even, if he was beyond the seas. Well, what is an ex post facto law? If there were no judicial interpretations, we should naturally say that it applied to all contracts. But the courts of judicatory will say that it merely means that none shall be punished as a criminal, for acts which the law has previously held to be innocent, without such change being made before the commission of the act. So with the word "exemption;" that likewise has not a fixed judicial meaning. I think the object of the gentleman would be obtained without the use of any words that would be productive of litigation. When the remedy enters into a part of the contract, the Legislature has not the power to interfere, under the constitution of the United States. If we do not go as far, or equal to the provisions of the constitution of the United States, it will be of no use, as grounds will always be taken upon the highest authority; but we may go farther, and properly so, in favor of our own citizens, provided we do not run counter to the constitution of the United States.

Mr. FRALICK—I agree with my colleague, that it might create some difficulty. People like me, not learned in the law, might have supposed that the remedy to enforce a contract was a part of the contract itself; at any rate, I would like to know what is the use of setting forth an obligation, if there is no remedy? If a man agrees to pay me a certain sum for a certain thing done, if I have no remedy, or cannot use the remedy, or the Legislature steps in and takes away the remedy, is not the obligation of the contract taken away? The Legislature of 1842 passed an act taking away the remedy; that is, they said that the laws enforcing execution previous to that year should not be enforced; and probably many persons on this floor could testify to that fact to their great injury. Now, if this Convention is going to sanction this doctrine, we ought to know it. I think, sir, that the passage of this law caused the people of this State to be held up as a by-word and a reproach. We were told we were not to be trusted. We agreed to do a certain thing, and after we had got their property, we did not pay them for it. If we are to have exemptions, why let it be so; but let every contract be fulfilled as it was made. If it is thought best to let the Legislature change the remedy, let us so state it, but do not let us use language that may tend to deceive.

Mr. WARDEN moved to insert after the word "contract," in section 16, "and no law altering or changing any law exempting property from levy or sale on execution, having retrospective action."

The question being taken on Mr. WARREN's amendment, the motion to insert was lost.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following substitute for section 16:

"No bill of attainder, ex-post facto law, either civil or criminal, shall be passed, nor any law impairing the obligation of a contract, or the remedy existing at the time such contract shall be made."

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out "bill of attainder." As far as any practical purpose was concerned, we might just as well enact that the Council of Ten of Venice, should not govern us, or that the ear of Juggernaut should not drive up to the capitol. He did not press the motion, but merely mentioned it on the principle that the declaration of the Bill of Rights should be as simple as possible.

The motion was lost.

Mr. GOODWIN said that before disposing of the question, it would be proper to refer to the state of judicial decisions relating to it.

Under the clause of the constitution of the United States prohibiting State Legislatures from passing laws impairing the obligations of contracts, the Supreme Court of the United States had some time since made two decisions bearing upon it.

One was the case of a law of Illinois in relation to mortgages, extending the time of redemption, and declared to be invalid with respect to pre-existing mortgages.

In the other—the appraisement laws as they are called; laws prohibiting the sale of property on execution when a certain appraised value was not reached—were declared within the provisions, and invalid with respect to previous contracts.

Soon after a case came before our Supreme Court in respect to our exemption laws, which it was urged were involved under that provision and for similar reasons. The Supreme Court of the United States had, in some of the opinions delivered, used language to the effect that State exemption laws were not within the prohibition; and our court did not feel bound to carry out the principle of reasoning of the court beyond the limit prescribed by themselves, and held the exemption laws valid in respect to contracts entered into previous to their passage, and not within the prohibition.

Soon after, the same question came before the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and that court, carrying out the reasoning of the U. S. Supreme Court, held such laws within the prohibition, and as to previous contracts, unconstitutional.

So that the decisions of the courts of New York and of this State are opposed to each other, on this point, and it has been thought best, so I am informed, to present the matter directly to the Supreme Court of the United States for its decision.

As this is an important question, it may be proper for the Convention to settle the point now; and perhaps it can as well be done in the Article before us as in any other way.

Mr. TIFFANY—There are many cases in which it is necessary that the legislature should have the power to pass retroactive laws, and there are cases in which it would not be so. I therefore concur with the gentleman from Wayne, that we should know specifically how far the constitution is to prohibit the legislature from passing retrospective laws.

Mr. WALKER—It seems to me that the amendment now offered would lead to endless difficulty, and does not assert a correct principle. I believe, sir, that we should not stop here, but should look at both sides of the question. Gentlemen talk about the rights of the creditor; but is the creditor only to be protected? Has the debtor no claim upon us; and do you not impair that claim by the passage of any more stringent collection law? I see no reason for putting this guard on the one hand, and not on the other. The laws specifying the time that execution shall be stayed, we cannot change, without leaving all the laws in operation under which contracts were made. This would introduce confusion in the administration. It ties up the hands of the legislature, if it does not give the same benefit to the debtor as the creditor. I rather prefer the amendment of the gentleman from Ingham, than that of the gentleman from Wayne; but the better place to insert it would be in the provision relating to the exemption of property from execution. It would give it a more definite meaning. It is better to pass it now, so as to incorporate it in the provisions of that bill.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Mr. Chairman, of what importance is it to take care of the debtor? He is of no consequence. The gentleman from Wayne avows it to be his object, by his amendment, to take away all power of action by the legislature in this matter, so that they shall pass no law which shall effect the remedy of the creditor against the debtor. But he is disposed to allow the legislature to pass laws still more stringent against the debtor; to draw the cord still tighter. Such, sir, has been the legislation of ages, upon the principle of government taking care of the rich, and the rich taking care of the poor. Sir, look to Ireland; there the rich have been taking care of the poor for centuries, and they are taking care of them yet. So, in Great Britain; there too, the rich have been taking care of the poor for generations, and they are yet doing it; and so the old world over. The rich are taking care of the poor, and the great mass of the legislation of ages gone by has been for the express purpose of providing laws and means to enable the rich to do it most effectually. And they have succeeded to admiration. But, sir, what is a contract? Is it not a voluntary matter between parties?—Why, then, should the State step in when the relation is formed, and put its whole power into the hands of one of the parties, to crush the other? Where is the right, the justice? And, because there has been some little legislation within some few years past, in favor of the man and his family, in favor of humanity, to protect the debtor class against the all selfishness of the other, what a hue and cry! If gentlemen want more stringent collection laws, and if such laws are evidence of high civilization or refinement, let them go back to the old Roman code. That contained laws tolerably stringent, which were in operation 427 years, and were a part of the Twelve Tables for 120 years. That code provided that when the debtor failed to pay, his creditors might cut him to pieces, each of them taking a share proportioned to his demand; and there, sir, you have your scales of justice.

Mr. WITHERELL—I do not suppose that any one here wishes to make a more stringent law. In former times, and I believe in the present day, amongst our Canadian friends, they put them in the "black hole" until they pay. But about the old law of Rome, this 427 years, I do not know any thing about it.

Mr. PIERCE—Go to the law of the Twelve Tables.

Mr. WITHERELL—The law of the Twelve Tables, was it? Well, cutting a man up on the Guinea scale, might do in California; it will not do here. The amendment of my friend from Wayne operates equally well upon both sides.

Mr. REDFIELD—I was in the legislature, and voted for these relief laws that have been under discussion, and I look back to it with pleasure. I find that the laws have been universally approved, and I now think if any thing of the kind is embraced in the constitution, it will be the main cause of its rejection by the people. I am confident that any thing tending to restrict any contingency that might arise would be unfavorably received.

Mr. FRALICK—I understand that this is to settle a principle—that is, whether we wish to live up to our contracts or have the privilege of referring to the legislature of the State, after getting other peoples' property, to shelter us from paying for it as we agreed.

The gentleman from Cass considers it a credit to the State to pass laws having retrospective action; in other words, that we may be allowed, under one set of laws, to get other peoples' property, then apply to the legislature, and get those laws changed so that it is impossible for the creditor to get his own. Now, sir, I, for one, do not consider such a course of conduct creditable to the State. But if we are to have a homestead exemption—a large personal exemption—let that then be the order of the day. But I do want the principle fixed that no remedy shall be impaired; that when a contract is made, that contract shall be enforced, and the people of the State will not ask, at least they ought not to ask, for any thing different.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG—I trust that no restrictions will be put upon the legislature upon this subject. It appears to me the gentleman from Wayne misapprehends our meaning. It is not for the purpose of breaking contracts, but for the purpose of protecting the poor honest man from undue severity on the part of his creditors—for the purpose of preventing any Shylock from exacting the pound of flesh. And, sir, I wish for no restriction, because I believe with the gentleman from Cass, that the laws alluded to that were passed for the relief of the people met with general approbation. We want, if a similar contingency should arise, to have a similar power of protecting the people, that the honest man who has toiled for a little pittance shall not have wrested by a hard hearted creditor the means of supporting his family.

Mr. BUSH—I have never exacted the pound of flesh. I seldom, if ever, enforce the law; but in forming a constitution for the government of the legislature and the people, and defining the original laws of the land, we should have principles, and have them clearly expressed. It is not, sir, whether 100 or $1000 should be exempt from execution; but that legislation should be uniform. Our principles should be clear, and such that the Supreme Court, when it makes its decisions, will concur in. I learn from our presiding officer that the Supreme Court of the State of New-York and the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan differ in their decisions about the constitutionality of exemption laws. What a view does this present, when learned judicial tribunals differ! Does it not show the necessity of simplifying our principles of government, so that all can understand? And when we have done that, we have done what the people ask. I care not whether the people accept or reject this constitution. It is not for me to inquire what the action of the people will be. It is for me to do my duty. That duty is to protect each man in his person and property, and that should be clearly understood, and not left to a vague uncertainty. If the principle is pushed to its extreme verge, an equal distribution of property throughout the land, I shall still be in as good a position as the gentleman from Cass. But let us do justice, though the heavens should fall!

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—It is said that the object of the proposed amendment was to prevent legislation for the benefit of the poor man. I disclaim any such intention. I believe the effect of the amendment is that the rights of all, whether rich or poor, shall be equally protected; that the poor man, entering into a contract, shall have all the benefit of the laws which he knows to exist at the time he entered into such contract.

Gentlemen have said they were members of the Legislature when certain laws were passed, and felt happy to rejoice over that fact. How many a poor man's farm was mortgaged under the law giving two year's redemption after sale, who finds that the Legislature has seen fit to change the time of redemption from two years to one? Is this legislating for the benefit of the poor man? If so, gentlemen are welcome to all the glory to be obtained therefrom. The principle involved in the different amendments and the substitute proposed, is simply this: shall the people of this State hereafter have the privilege of making contracts in accordance with existing laws, and enforcing these contracts according to those laws, without a subsequent Legislature having the power to alter, materially, the nature of the remedy? And in this the poor man is equally interested with the rich. All classes are interested alike in having a permanent system of legislation. I am utterly opposed to any legislation for the benefit of a class. The rights of all should be equally respected, by making the remedy as sacred as the obligation of a contract, of which it is a part.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG—I suppose that we came here to represent the interests of our constituents, not our own views and feelings. We are bound to consider the voice of the masses. I hold that we are the servants of the public. I hold to the doctrine of instruction; and we should endeavor to incorporate in our acts what we know to be public sentiment.

Another sentiment that I have heard about the constitution of the State of New York. Sir, I am a native of the State of New York, and I refer to her with pride, but it is not proper that the talent and intellect of this State should be made to follow the State of New York. The State of Michigan has advanced ahead of the State of New York in many respects. We may appeal to our own courts and our own decisions with pride; and, I doubt not, we shall have a constitution that will compare well with the constitution of the State of New York.

I hope that the Legislature will not be restricted; that they will be at liberty to protect the laboring man from the oppression of a hard-hearted creditor.

The CHAIR—The question now is upon striking out section 16, and taking up the substitute of the gentleman from Jackson, that "no bill of attainder, or ex post facto law, either civil or criminal, shall be passed, nor any law impairing the obligation of a contract, or the remedy existing at the time such contract shall be made."

A division of the question being called for, the committee refused to strike out section 16.

Section 17 being under consideration,

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL, it was amended by striking out "and unjust," and inserting "or unusual."

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, section 18 was amended by adding at the end thereof: "private roads may be opened in the manner to be prescribed by law; but in every case the necessities of the road, and the amount of all damage to be sustained by the opening thereof, shall be first determined by a jury of freeholders, and such amount, together with the expenses of the proceeding, shall be paid by the person or persons to be benefitted."

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend section 18 by adding after "for," in the first line, "the use of the State or of any corporation;" and by adding after "therefor," the words "previously made therefor or tendered."

Which was not adopted.

Mr. TIFFANY moved to amend as follows: add at the end of section 18, "first paid or tendered, or otherwise disposed of, as shall be prescribed by law, for the benefit of the persons whose property shall be intended to be taken, except when to be appropriated for the benefit of municipal corporations, for common roads, or the State."

Which motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the last vote was reconsidered, and the question being on the amendment of Mr. TIFFANY,

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend the amendment by adding after "therefor," in first line, "nor for the use of any corporation without compensation previously made or tendered."

Pending which, on motion of Mr.

STOREY, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the article back to the Convention, and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the Convention then adjourned.

THURSDAY, (10th day,) June 13.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. P. R. ADAMS: of JOHN CRAWFORD and 108 others, of Lenawee county, relative to the management of the State Prison. Referred.

By Mr. TOWN: of John MABBS and 26 others, praying that the word "white" be dispensed with in the revised constitution. Referred.

REPORTS.

Mr. RAYNALE, from the committee to invite the resident clergy of this village to attend alternately and open the sessions by prayer, reported that they had performed that duty in part, and that the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY, Mr. SANFORD and Mr. TOOKER have been in attendance. And the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY has directed the committee to say to the convention that he declines any remuneration in the manner proposed.

The report was accepted and the committee continued.

On motion of Mr. COOK,

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of Article 1, "Bill of Rights," Mr. BRITAIN in the chair.

The CHAIR stated that the question was on the amendment offered by the delegate from Wayne, [Mr. WITHERELL,] to the amendment offered by the delegate from Lenawee, [Mr. TIFFANY,] to the 18th section.

Mr. TIFFANY corrected his original proposition so that it should read: add at the end of the original section, "first paid or tendered or otherwise disposed of under provisions of law."

The question being on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. WITHERELL, by adding after the word "therefor," in first line, "nor for the use of any corporation, without compensation previously made or tendered."

Mr. W. said: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Lenawee might cover the ground; if so, a good and valuable purpose would be answered. The State would be left as it now stands under the present constitution. By the amendment proposed, payment for the property would be required from corporations previous to taking possession. He believed the State would always be ready to meet its engagements. With respect to roads, he saw no necessity for any provision. The public roads do not belong to corporations, but to the State. There has never been any difficulty about them, as the law now stands.

Mr. TIFFANY—Under the article reported by the committee, private property may be taken for public purposes, whether paid for before or after. His proposition was that it should not be taken without previous payment, except in the case of common roads. It had been urged against its adoption, that it might be found inconvenient in any case of emergency, such as a state of war. But in time of war they would most probably act independent of all law.

Mr. WHIPPLE did not perceive the necessity for adopting the amendment to the amendment. If he understood the amendment correctly, it proposes that no corporation shall take private property, except in certain cases. In his opinion, the section reported by the committee was all that was necessary for the security of private rights. It is to be borne in mind that it is not within the constitutional authority of the legislature to authorize any and every corporation to appropriate private property to their use. It is only where private property is to be appropriated to public use, that the high sovereign power in question can be legitimately exercised. It is not competent for the legislature to authorize mere private corporations to appropriate the private property of the citizen to its use. The distinction between a public and private corporation, and a public and private use, must be steadily kept in view, in considering the question before us. To illustrate the distinction, I will state a case: The legislative authority of the late Territory, incorporated the Detroit and Pontiac Railroad Company, and authorized them to enter upon and appropriate private property, when necessary for the construction of the road. A question has arisen in the Supreme Court, whether such authority to appropriate private property, was lawfully conferred. The determination of that question will depend upon the fact, whether the corporation is public or private. If, by the terms of their charter, the company are bound to transport persons and property over their road upon payment of a reasonable toll, then the use becomes public, and the authority to appropriate private property was properly exercised. On the contrary, should it turn out that there exists no legal obligation on the part of the company to transport persons and property, on payment of a reasonable toll, then the use is private, and the grant nugatory and void.

I see no propriety in adopting the amendment of the delegate from Wayne; nor do I altogether like that proposed by the delegate from Lenawee. The first branch of the amendment I think desirable, but the latter branch, I think quite unnecessary. We fulfill our whole duty, when we direct that adequate compensation be made before private property can be appropriated to public use. The article under discussion should assert general principles, and not go too much into detail.

Mr. TIFFANY—The objection is to that part of the amendment referring to some provision to be made by law. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to it. My object is, that provision may be made in the case of minors or persons residing out of the State. You cannot pay or tender payment to them. To meet those cases, I would insert the clause.

Mr. WHIPPLE—The object is a good one, but it is not necessary to insert this provision. The law describes to whom payment shall be made in such cases. I dislike this detail to go with the constitution. I want the article to assert general and fundamental principles, without going into petty detail.

Mr. TIFFANY said it appeared to him to be a necessary provision for cases which have not been provided for, in cases of guardians and minors, where it might be difficult to pay or tender payment.

Mr. CORNELL—We are come here to frame a constitution, and not to legislate; to deliberate upon fundamental principles, and not details. I would ask whether the article does not cover the whole ground? A provision is made for payment in the section reported by the committee. Unless it is actually paid, is there any compensation? The legislature will carry out the provision.

Mr. WITHERELL—There is much good sense in the remark made by the gentleman from Jackson, in regard to the construction of the section as reported. Yet the courts in the State of New York have decided differently. Now, sir, there is a constant leaning to precedents to guide their decisions; and notwithstanding the opinion of my friend, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] in his judicial capacity, yet his good sense may be overcome. The courts in New York have decided that they may take possession; and if they can take possession, they may keep possession for one, fifty, or a hundred years. If they may take possession, what is the use of the provision? A railroad may cut up a man's farm—may take it without payment. They may take it and keep it, and leave the persons whose property they have taken, to get the money as they can, a mortgage, perhaps, being held on the road by a foreign company, for more than the road is worth. In such a case, an individual may be compelled to sacrifice some of his rights, or subject himself to expenses in obtaining justice, equal in amount to the money he may ultimately receive. He [Mr. W.] was opposed to allowing those corporations to take property, without making payment before taking possession.

Mr. TIFFANY withdrew the clause in his amendment, "otherwise disposed of," &c.

The CHAIR—The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WITHERELL withdrew the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TIFFANY again modified his amendment.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out all after the word "tendered." Mr. P. said the law would provide for the contingencies which the gentleman from Lenawee had suggested.

Mr. WALKER would inquire whether it was in order—if it was competent for the committee to strike out any amendment that has been concurred in by the Convention? The amendment offered by Mr.

WILLIAMS had been deliberately adopted by the Convention, and it appeared to him that it could not be taken out, except by reconsideration of the vote by which it was adopted.

Mr. STURGIS—Being interested in a new county, he was disposed to sustain the amendment of the gentleman from Lenawee. Without such an amendment, it would be extremely difficult to get a road through the new counties, where the lands are held by non-residents. It would be difficult to ascertain who the owners were.

The amendment proposed by Mr. J. D. PIERCE was negatived.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. TIFFANY, to add to section 18, "payment to be first made or tendered, except when to be appropriated for public highways,"

Mr. HANSCOM said, by the proposed amendment, public highways are excepted from the provisions of the section. It might become a question, whether you might not allow private property to be taken for common roads without compensation.

Mr. COOK—The amendment appeared to him likely to prevent the construction of railroads and plank roads through non-resident lands. It may be impossible to find the owner. Some provision of this kind would be necessary: Add "first paid or tendered, or deposited with the county treasurer, for the benefit of the owner, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." He would therefore move to amend by inserting after the word "therefor," "being first paid or tendered in such manner as the legislature may provide."

Mr. CORNELL—Nothing that had been said convinced him that the section, as reported, was defective. One amendment seems to call for another to explain it. This going into detail belongs to the legislature. He apprehended wisdom would not perish with this convention. It appeared to him better to adopt the section as reported by the committee, leaving details to the subsequent action of the legislature. The section covered the ground so far as it was necessary to go.

Mr. EATON concurred with the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. CORNELL.] He thought the language of the section plain enough. It was said that in the State of

New-York the courts had given a construction to a similar provision, that private property might be taken for public uses without compensation being first made, or payment tendered; but if courts of justice put this construction on such language, there is no language the convention could adopt which they could not as easily pervert. It seemed to him the language reported was as plain as possible. That corporations had taken property without compensation was true, but it had been done in violation of law and of the constitution.

Mr. FRALICK rose to offer a substitute to come in at the end of the section as printed; to add, "and for the use of no corporation without payment being first made or tendered, or deposited with the county treasurer under provisions according to law." Mr. F. said: public roads are left as they now are. A provision is made for private roads. This will provide for cases in relation to corporations.

The CHAIR—The question in order is on the amendment sent to the chair by the delegate from Hillsdale.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD concurred in the views expressed by the gentleman from Wayne. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] was best adapted to meet the case. He would mention a case which had occurred in his neighborhood, where great injustice had been done by the constitution, as it stands, or the construction put upon it. It was a case where minor heirs held real estate. A road was desired across their farm, which had been materially injured by the previous construction of roads. An appeal was taken; no one being able effectually to represent those heirs, a very insufficient sum was awarded for damages. But what is more, the damages so awarded have not been paid. It may be said the law provides a remedy. But does it so, indeed? Does it provide a remedy, when they have to go to a court of law, and be under the necessity of expending one moiety of the money awarded for damages in recovering it? It is said the supervisors may assess for the damages awarded; but they have not done so. Intentional or unintentional, those heirs have been wronged under the law as it now stands.

He saw no material difference between townships and corporations. Whatever the construction of the courts in this State may be, the practice is the same as under the construction of the courts in the State of New York. Shall we require those heirs to expend the whole of the money awarded for damages in obtaining a decision of the courts on the construction of the clause of the constitution?

Mr. B. concluded by expressing his conviction that no injustice could be done to townships, cities or corporations, by saying if private property is required by them, payment shall be previously made or tendered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—I would remark on the subject under consideration, that whatever might be the opinions of our judges, the practice in this State very nearly agrees with the views taken by the Supreme Court in New York; as remarked by the gentleman from Jackson, the practice, sir, is the same, whatever views we may entertain as to the construction of the laws and the constitution. Every expression given by the Legislature in their enactments on this subject, tends to sustain the same doctrine. Chapter 25, section 8 of the Revised States, authorizes roads to be laid through lands belonging to individuals, leaving the owners to make application for damages; which application, if not made within a limited time, the right to be compensated shall be forfeited. So they can make roads through any man's farm, and he must lose his property, without compensation, unless he makes an effort to obtain it.

Mr. WILLIAMS—That law has been repealed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—It has been altered—it has been modified, so that if they take land under improvement they shall first pay for it. If it were the principle established in the constitution, was it necessary to provide for previous payment in one case? It admits it might be so taken without such provision. Do not the provisions of law go to show that the constitution is understood here as in New York? The practice of legislation tends to this decision. Frequent changes are made in the laws, but every modification tends to support the view of that construction.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—The clause reported by the committee covers the whole ground. It is not the object for which the delegates have assembled in Convention, to legislate, to enter into details—but to establish fundamental principles. All that was required was accomplished in the report of the committee. If the courts of New York had made a decision contrary to common sense, he [Mr. Van V.] hoped the Convention would not be influenced by it.

Mr. WOODMAN was desirous of coming to a vote on the question. Much time had been spent in debate, and much more might be occupied by gentlemen, but he believed they would fail to enlighten the Convention. The proposed amendment to the original section was all that was necessary to perfect it; it met his views and he was ready to vote on it.

Mr. BAGG would vote against the amendment and substitute. He was in favor of having simple propositions—one article embracing one proposition. There appeared to him to be too much disposition to legislate in the convention, which he was afraid would prolong the session.

Mr. COMSTOCK—With the amendment added, the rights of non-resident land holders would be protected and public interests secured.

Mr. BACKUS would suggest whether the gentleman's object would not be attained by striking out all the provisions relating to the county treasury, and inserting, "to be first paid or tendered, or otherwise disposed of by provisions of law;" whether he would not attain the same end by less verbiage.

There will arise a difficulty under the terms made use of in the bill of rights; but some terms must be made use of to guard against the evils which have been justly complained of; to guard against the abuse of the powers given to corporations; to secure individuals from being harrassed when presenting claims for compensation. Provisions have been heretofore made for laying out roads and constructing canals and railroads. They have also provided for compensation to individuals for property taken for such use; but how? Some by a jury—some by commissioners. But who sets that in motion? It is the very difficulty that should be provided for, and the humble citizen protected in the enjoyment of his property, or full compensation made, and that promptly, when his property is required for public use. Such was the end proposed by our laws, but in practice it is not carried out. They go on and take possession, leaving the humble citizen to pursue, through juries and commissioners, till he finds himself brought up in the Supreme Court, after spending all that he is entitled to receive in obtaining justice. The provision should be so framed as to secure the humble citizen from oppression. If the public want the property, let the public take the incipient steps to secure it, as one citizen takes to obtain the property of another. It would be a singular provision, that you should allow one person to take the property of another and leave it to juries or commissioners to settle the terms. The public do the same thing. Is it right or just? A citizen may be in possession of 40 acres of land, which, by the labor of his own hands, he may have reclaimed from the wilderness and brought into cultivation. The public come by commissioners and run through his land a rail road; they pass on, take the land, send on workmen and prostrate his fences. What can he do? Resort to a jury. The decision of the jury may be removed to another court. They may harrass him and compel him to take twenty-five cents on the dollar, rather than pursue his just claim. Property should not be taken for private use except by contract; nor for public use without ample compensation being first made. The section in relation to this matter should be declaratory of principle, and expressed in plain and comprehensive language. But suppose it stands as here reported, with the clause, "first paid or tendered?" This has a legal signification. What does it mean? That it shall be deposited in the State Treasury? No sir. There arises a question which ought, if possible, to be avoided. Terms should be used which do not require adjudication, either by the Legislature or the courts of law. If it should be considered that the absolute legal notion of a tender, should be carried out to its full legal extent, it would be found impracticable. Guard the fundamental law, that the public shall not take the poor man's property without compensation for it, by simply providing that the payment shall be made, or tendered or otherwise disposed of by law.

Mr. REDFIELD suggested the words, "payment previously made or provided for."

Mr. WHIPPLE would add, "payment being first made or tendered in such manner as the legislature shall prescribe."

Mr. COOK—Would that allow the money to be deposited?

Mr. WHIPPLE—Certainly.

Mr. COOK accepted it as a substitute for his amendment, and offered it as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Lenawee.

Mr. WHIPPLE—It is true, as has been stated, that the judicial authorities in New York have decided that a public corporation may enter upon and use the property of an individual without first making compensation. I beg to state, however, for the information of the committee, that the question has not yet been judicially determined in this State by that tribunal whose decisions are authoritative. I think the Convention would act wisely by placing some restriction upon the exercise of this right of eminent domain, and provide, in clear and intelligible language, that private property shall not be taken for public use unless adequate compensation be first made. The insertion of such a clause in our constitution will have the effect of putting a question at rest which may lead to expensive and protracted litigation.

Mr. WITHERELL—Frequently the question of title is raised; it may not be known to whom the money ought to go. In such cases the Legislature can provide for the money being deposited till adjudication decides who of the claimants shall be entitled to it.

Mr. CRARY—This section has assumed various shapes by the amendments proposed, but it has come back nearly to the original proposition. He [Mr. C.] had an objection to the proposition in that form, as he had also to it as proposed to be amended. His view of the matter was this: that no property should be taken without compensation made or tendered. On the construction of the words—"compensation made or tendered,"—suppose the person who owns the property is not in the country and cannot be reached any way; it would be difficult to make a tender unless the Legislature put a great stretch on the words; therefore, he was not in favor of the word. Leaving the construction of these to be decided by the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] he [Mr. C.] had still objections to the clause in the shape it stood. It appeared to him that unless there was a wish to trammel the State it ought to be left as it is. If they want it more specific, let them say that no property shall be taken by the State, and no property shall be taken by corporations, other than municipal, without compensation being made or tendered.

There were reasons for excepting municipal corporations; they should make compensation before taking property, but circumstances frequently occurred under which it might be proper to take private property without making compensation. Take the case of the city of Detroit. Suppose a fire was raging through that city and they find it necessary to pull down houses to stop the conflagration; would not that be taking private property for public use? And this necessity might arise when they had no money in the treasury. The owner might say: you shall not take my property; and a timid man might be frightened lest he should violate the law and the constitution. The city has a population of some 25,000 inhabitants; in a few years it may contain 100,000, and a case may occur when, as in Philadelphia, it may be necessary that the military take possession of houses, or fire into buildings and burn them up. The whole community might be injured by the clause that no property shall be taken by corporations without payment being first made or tendered, unless municipal corporations are made an exception.

If you look [said Mr. C.] at the non-resident lands through which our roads run, unless you are careful in framing the fundamental law, you will have no means to carry on the improvements which the public require.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I am unable to comprehend the force of the argument of the delegate from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY.] The gentleman supposes the case of a fire desolating the city of Detroit, and suggests that the constitution should be so framed as to anticipate the happening of such a calamity. The provision as reported, is inapplicable to such a state of things. When the cities of New York and Philadelphia were visited with a desolating fire, which baffled all ordinary efforts to extinguish it, resort was had to the destruction of buildings with a view to arrest the progress of the devouring element. Now, sir, the right thus to destroy private property does not find its vindication in the clause under consideration. It rests upon a higher law than human constitution,—the law of self-preservation,—the law of necessity. Private property, under the circumstances referred to, is not taken for public use, but is devoted to destruction to arrest a great and overwhelming calamity. With respect to the argument of the gentleman, touching the right of municipal corporations to take private property for public use, I perceive no difficulty. The charters of each city provide the mode and manner by which private property may be taken for the public use. Compensation in all such cases is made for private property thus taken, whether such property is required for making new streets or altering others; or whether it is devoted to any other public use. The gentleman, I am sure, will not sacrifice private rights by authorizing municipal corporations to take the property of individuals without providing adequate compensation.

Mr. J. CLARK was opposed to the amendments under consideration, not because he was opposed to their insertion in a proper place and at a proper time, but not in the bill of rights. There was a committee appointed who had under consideration some of those subjects at the present time.

Take, for instance, the question of public highways. He [Mr. C.] would venture to say, that under the provisions proposed to be substituted, public highways could not be laid out. It is frequently the case that there is no money in the township treasury. Under our present laws compensation is offered; if the owner of the property agrees to take it the question is settled; if not, a jury is called who assess the damages, and the money paid. He hoped the amendments would be voted down, and the article as reported adopted. Some of the amendments were proper, but not at this time or place.

Mr. CORNELL was satisfied with the article as reported. Gentlemen had been taxing their ingenuity in proposing amendments. He was glad to see that they were falling back upon the original proposition.

The question was taken on the substitute for the amendment and lost.

The question recurring on the adoption of the amendment,

The PRESIDENT [Mr. GOODWIN] was opposed to the amendment as it now stood. The restriction ought to be made applicable to all cases where private property was taken for public use. He thought the exception as it stood would allow private property to be taken for public highways without any compensation. It was objectionable, however, in either view. In reference to taking private property for public highways particularly, he did not see why there should not be as much restraint as in taking it under the authority of the State in any other case. The object seemed to be to allow new townships to construct roads through unimproved lands; but it should be considered that in the case of improved lands it might operate very injuriously. Roads might be laid out through fields, orchards, gardens, and even buildings might be removed. But this was not all. Municipal corporations, including cities and incorporated villages, are proposed to be exempted. It must have come under every person's observation, who has noticed the proceedings of those incorporated bodies of men, that under whatever name, whether of councils or trustees of villages or boroughs, they were not disposed to exercise their power with great forbearance. So prevalent was the opinion with respect to the abuse of their power, that it had become a maxim that corporations have no souls. There certainly appeared to be as much reason for imposing restraints on municipal as on private corporations.

In reference to private corporations under similar provisions, it has been held that they cannot be empowered to take private property unless designed to be appropriated for public use. Rail road corporations can be authorized to take it only when the roads are made in fact public highways, and the right is secured to the public by their charters to enjoy the benefits contemplated in granting them—the transportation of public property.

In reference to the objections of the gentleman from Calhoun, cases of emergency may arise of the nature and character to which he alludes. These cases are beyond the control of law. The objection would exist on the same ground to the original article. He had never known any statute to provide for such cases. To tear down a man's house, to destroy his orchard or occupy his field—these acts are resorted to in cases of emergency in defiance of the law at the time, leaving the compensation to be settled when the emergency should cease. He was opposed to the amendment as it stood, and should vote against it.

The question was taken on the amendment and lost.

Section 19 was read: The people shall have the right peaceably to assemble together to consult for the common good, to instruct their Representatives, and petition the Legislature for the redress of grievances.

Mr. BUSH moved to strike out the word "shall," which was concurred in.

Sections 20 and 21 were read and passed without amendment.

Section 22. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crime, shall ever be tolerated in this State.

Mr. RAYNALE offered the following substitute:

"Involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crime, shall never be tolerated in this State."

Mr. S. CLARK—It is taken from the ordinance of '87, and is the language of the old constitution.

Mr. RAYNALE was aware that it was the language of the ordinance of '87, but the ordinance had no influence over us; it had become a dead letter. It was true, it was in the old constitution, but he did not like the word "slavery;" it was an objectionable term in relation to the people of Michigan. If the constitution should be held for any length of time, it may come to be considered that slavery had existed here, or that there had been apprehensions of its being introduced. There was no occasion for the word in the constitution; he therefore wished the section altered.

The substitute was not adopted.

Sec. 23. No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any civil action on mesne, or final process, unless in cases of fraud; and no person shall be imprisoned for a militia fine in time of peace.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend by striking out the words "mesne or final process." It would make it as the law now is. In some actions it is so; but in cases of trespass, a person having no property to make compensation, should be liable to imprisonment for the payment of the damages.

The motion prevailed.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to amend as follows:

Sec. 23, line 2, after "fraud," insert "but the provision shall not extend to actions of debt for fines, penalties or forfeitures, or to actions founded on promises to marry, or for moneys collected by any public officer, or in any professional employment."

Mr. S. said the amendment he proposed was taken from the non-imprisonment act. The intention of that act undoubtedly was to protect debtors, and not wrong-doers. The section as reported covered a class of citizens which it was not intended to cover under the non-imprisonment act.

Mr. BUSH would inquire if the word "fraud," in the second section, was not a perfect guaranty, and whether it would not allow the legislature to pass an act similar to that of '46? Could not a fine be imposed where fraud was perpetrated? Would not a breach of promise of marriage, and where a public officer did not pay over moneys received by him in his official capacity, be considered frauds; and would not the legislature provide for punishment in such cases? He [Mr. B.] was in favor of having a person who commits a fraud made liable to imprisonment for it. He would not allow him, under a plea of debt, to escape unwhipped of justice.

Mr. WHIPPLE—There is a great difference between moral fraud and legal fraud; it is a moral fraud, if a man can pay a debt and will not, but you cannot arrest him. A breach of contract is a moral fraud, and yet not a legal fraud. A public officer who is entrusted to collect money and does not pay over, commits a legal fraud, and ought to be punished. Marriage was a civil contract, and ought to stand as other civil contracts.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—A poor man who is unable to pay his debts may be accused of fraud under our present laws, and his rights jeopardized. He was opposed to imprisonment in all civil actions. He was willing that fraud should be punished; but if a person resorts to a civil action, let him come under the rule. He would not leave a door open by which under such circumstances a man might be deprived of his liberty, if not able to pay the fine. If a man has committed fraud, let him be prosecuted criminally. In any case where a person has done an injury, no benefit can arise by the man being incarcerated on civil process. You put him in jail, but do not get damages. Let it be optional whether to proceed by a criminal action or civil suit; but let the provisions of the non-imprisonment act extend to all cases where civil actions are brought.

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to amend the amendment by striking out "in actions founded on promises to marry."

Mr. HANSCOM believed if that clause were struck out, the remainder of the proposed amendment would be of no use; the other specifications are included in the word "fraud."

Mr. SULLIVAN did not admit the fact. Most of the exceptions were not covered. A fine may be imposed and a penalty follow in other cases than fraud. A fine might be imposed for not attending court on subpoena, and in several other cases which could not be classed under the head of fraud. In case of breach of promise of marriage, there seemed to be no reason for exemption. The exemption should be in cases of engagements which persons are unable to perform; as in cases of debt where persons are not able to pay; but in cases of breach of promise of marriage, he supposed the man had the power to keep the promise, and he ought not to be placed beyond the power of the law of arrest.

The motion to amend did not prevail, and the amendment offered by Mr. SULLIVAN was negatived.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out all after "debt," to and including "fraud," and insert the words, "arising out of, or founded on a contract expressed or implied."

Mr. WITHERELL wished to know what was meant by the words "expressed or implied." A contract was a contract, without the words "expressed or implied."

Mr. CRARY—I only proposed to substitute the clause which is in the Wisconsin constitution. I suppose if I had left out the word "implied," the gentleman from Wayne would have moved to insert it on the principle he moved to insert the word "person," yesterday.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. S. CLARK, section 24 was stricken out.

Sec. 25. No person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief.

Mr. J. BARTOW would inquire of the chairman of the committee who reported the 25th section, if it was not provided for in the sixth section? That section appeared to cover the whole ground. Unless there were some special reason for retaining the clause, he would move to strike it out.

Mr. S. CLARK—For greater security a majority of the committee thought it ought to be retained.

Mr. WHIPPLE did not think with the gentleman from Genesee, that it was covered by the 6th section. Was it a civil right? clearly not. A political right? certainly not. Then it was not provided for.

Mr. GARDINER rose to explain. The committee had insisted that this section should be incorporated. Under the 6th section they had frequently seen witnesses ruled off the stand on account of their religious belief. The committee wanted to do away with the practice by which a court assumed inquisitorial power over our citizens. It is not right that a man should be expelled from the stand and not be allowed to give testimony because he does not concede to the creed that has been hewed out by other persons. Make them responsible under the laws for the testimony they give, and punish them if they do not tell the truth.

Mr. J. BARTOW—If there were any doubt about the construction of the 6th section, he would withdraw the amendment. He was not disposed to interfere with the rights of witnesses.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out all after the word "proceedings," in section 26. He saw no particular analogy between the two clauses. If the clause relating to lotteries was necessary to be inserted, it ought to be in a separate provision.

The amendment was rejected.

Sec. 27. The assent of two-thirds of the members elected to each branch of the Legislature shall be requisite to every bill appropriating the public moneys or property for local or private purposes.

Mr. ROBERTSON offered the following substitute for section 27:

"The Legislature shall have no power to appropriate the public moneys or property for local or private purposes."

Pending which, Mr. COOK moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Which motion did not prevail.

The question recurring on Mr. ROBERTSON'S substitute, the same was not adopted.

Sec. 28. No lease or grant of agricultural land for a longer period than twelve years, hereafter made, in which shall be reserved any rent or service of any kind, shall be valid.

Mr. J. BARTOW said—The committee who have reported this article have furnished the Convention with no reasons which influenced them to report this new feature in the constitution. He would call on them for reasons for its insertion. It was copied from the New York constitution; but it was not a sufficient reason that because it was incorporated in the constitution of one State, it should be in that of another.

Mr. S. CLARK would admit that a question might be raised as to its applicability to this State; but the disposition of property in the State of New York, had been productive of very serious evils. It was to prevent the like occurrence in this State that the provision was reported by the committee. It has reference to the future, in view of what has happened in New York.

Mr. BARTOW saw no necessity for making provision against danger, when no danger was apprehended. Communities have prospered without such prohibitions as this. He knew of no other case that could be similar to that of New York. Some old rights existed after the revolutionary war; and the article in their constitution was introduced to meet the evils arising from them. Mr. B. saw no reason for a limitation to twelve or to twenty-five years.

It seemed an innovation for which he saw no necessity.

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to strike out the section. He saw no good reason for its insertion. In family arrangements, life leases are frequently given. Such arrangements could not be made under this clause, at least not to extend beyond twelve years.

The motion prevailed.

Sec. 29. No corporation shall hold any real estate for a longer period than ten years, except such real estate as shall be actually occupied by such corporation in the exercise of its franchises.

Mr. BARTOW wished to know what they were to do with it after ten years.

Mr. S. CLARK—Well sir, sell it, and not hold real estate beyond the wants of the corporation.

Mr. WITHERELL wished to ask if it were not a restriction that would be cut off by the constitution of the United States, and itself be unconstitutional.

Such a provision would operate injuriously in Michigan. Religious societies are corporations holding real estate. It contemplates that no corporation shall hold real estate for a longer period than ten years, except in exercise of its franchises. Vested rights would be impaired by this section being placed in the constitution. It has a retrospective action, and in its operation would be most oppressive. He [Mr. W.] could point to a religious society in Detroit that owns much real estate which is not necessary for their use in their corporate capacity. Under this clause they would forfeit it.

Mr. CHURCH—They would not forfeit it, but be required to change it into some other fund, less objectionable to the interests of the community.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend so that it would read "estate hereafter acquired."

Mr. WHIPPLE apprehended serious difficulties would arise under that section. Questions will arise as to what is to be understood by the term "actually occupied." How much can they occupy? How much is it necessary for them to occupy?

Mr. GOODWIN—A banking house and lot.

Mr. ——— The object of the clause was to prevent the accumulation of real estate in the hands of corporate bodies. It was not forfeiting any thing, but requiring them to convert such assets into money, to prevent those inconveniences which must arise under our institutions, if large tracts of land are held in perpetuity by corporate bodies.

Mr. SKINNER moved to strike out the word "actually," and insert "necessarily."

Which did not prevail.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend by inserting the word "private" after the word "no," in first line, so that it should read "no private corporation," &c.

Which did not prevail.

Mr. LEE moved to strike out the section.

Which was negatived.

Mr. LEACH moved to strike out section 31.

Which did not prevail.

On motion, the committee rose and reported progress.

Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, (11th day,) June 14.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

Petitions and reports were called for, and none being offered.

Mr. WITHERELL moved that the committee of the whole be discharged from the consideration of "Article —. Of the Seat of Government."

Mr. W. said the article could be then taken up and acted upon.

Mr. BRITAIN hoped, before the salutary rule adopted by the Convention was changed, some good reason would be given. He never found a legislative body able to do business as it should be done, unless all proceedings were taken in their regular order.

Mr. WITHERELL had no better reason to assign than that the article embraced only a single point, which could be settled at once, without argument or debate.

Mr. BRITAIN did not deem the reason given a sufficient one. The motion proposed to take up business out of its regular order. Although the article embraced only a single point, it might lead to debate. He saw no necessity for putting it ahead of other business—it should come up in its regular order. Mr. B. said if the regular order of business was to be broken up, it was important to know by whom it was done. He called for the ayes and noes.

Mr. J. CLARK thought there was at least one reason that presented itself for taking the question up. Members, in a few days, would be leaving on business, and in order to have a full and fair expression, the Convention should be full. Perhaps a larger number were then present than would be for some time.

The call for the ayes and noes was sustained, and the motion to discharge the committee lost—ayes 46, nays 47.

On motion of Mr. BUSH, the Convention went into committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of the Bill of Rights.

Section 9 being under consideration,

Mr. KINGSLEY offered the following substitute:

"The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate; but to entitle the party to a jury in a civil cause he shall demand the same as the law may direct, and the Legislature may provide that a less number than twelve may constitute a jury in civil causes."

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend the substitute by adding at the end thereof the words, "in courts not of record." Lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked permission to read a substitute he proposed to offer to section 9:

"The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate; but shall be deemed to be waived, in all civil cases, unless demanded by one of the parties, in such manner as shall be directed by law; and the Legislature may authorize a trial by a jury of a less number than twelve men."

Mr. KINGSLEY said the substitute of Mr. ROBERTSON embraced his proposition, and would carry out the object he wished. He accepted it as a modification.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he hoped the substitute would prevail, or something similar in its provisions. It was true that for a long course of years the number required to constitute a jury was twelve—yet there was no magic in the number, and no good reason could be assigned why twelve men were better qualified or better constituted for a jury than six. Under the constitution, as it stood, there was doubt as to whether the act of the legislature, authorizing a jury of a less number than twelve in the county courts, was valid; and it would be well to define it clearly. But juries of a less number than twelve had been often called in the county courts, and he had never heard but the rights of parties were as well attended to and as well settled as they could have been by twelve.

The object of a jury was to decide on the facts. As judges in the decision of questions were often bound by strict technical rules, which might work injustice, juries of the vicinage were called that they might determine the truth of facts alleged, under the law, as given by the court; they being considered better judges of questions of fact than those who habitually looked at them through the technical medium of the law.

As to the question of expense, a smaller number would be a saving to the counties, to individuals and to the state at large. Mr. R. had great respect and veneration for old institutions; yet until some good and valid reason had been given why the particular number of twelve was necessary to constitute a jury, he must favor the proposition of a less number in civil cases.

Mr. HANSCOM thought the proposition embraced a contradiction in terms.—First, the right of trial by jury was declared inviolate, and then followed the proposition authorizing the Legislature to reduce it to one or two persons. He considered the substitute, as it stood, a solecism, as the last clause of the proposition nullified the right sought to be enforced in the first. By the common law construction, a jury consisted of twelve men; and if standing in the connexion proposed, one clause of the constitution would conflict with the other, and one part of the constitution be in itself unconstitutional.

Mr. KINGSLEY said the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM,] thought the substitute under consideration contradicted itself—that a jury is understood to be a common law jury of twelve men. If said [Mr. K.,] that was so invariably, we had heretofore been continually violating the constitution; for the old constitution said nothing of inferior courts in reference to juries, and juries of a less number than twelve men had been authorized in justices courts. In county courts, the law provided that a less number than twelve may constitute a jury to try causes in that court; and the practice in that court was not considered unconstitutional.

Mr. COOK said the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM,] seemed afraid to trust this power to the Legislature, or to his constituents, where it now existed, and had heretofore existed under the present constitution, less they should entirely abolish the right of trial by jury, by reducing the number to one or two persons. The substitute only left the matter as it heretofore stood.

Mr. HANSCOM remarked, the gentleman from Hillsdale [Mr. Cook,] misunderstood him. His objection was not to the terms proposed by the substitute, but to the language used. He considered the declaration embraced in the first part of the proposition, declaring the right of trial by jury inviolate, and what followed, authorizing the Legislature to reduce the number to one or two persons, contradictory. The section, as it stood in the old bill of rights, he thought, contained all that was needed. The practice of the courts was well understood, and why not leave it so now.

Mr. KINGSLEY had been informed that in some of the new counties parties had demanded a jury of twelve men as a right, established by the old bill, and the court decided favorably to the demand.

Mr. WALKER thought a change in the phraseology would effect the proper object. He moved to amend the substitute by striking out the words "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," and inserting "parties in civil suits shall have a right to a trial by a jury."

Mr. W. said the words "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," received the common law construction—a jury of twelve men—and by that construction the substitute was a contradiction in terms, as the right of trial by jury was first declared to be inviolate, and then it proposed to reduce the number of jurymen. He proposed to amend by introducing other language, so as clearly to define what was intended. The word jury did not literally mean twelve men; it meant sworn; being derived from a Latin word, "juro," to swear. It was true, that for a long time juries of a less number than twelve had been called in some courts, but under different language than that used in the substitute.

Mr. CRARY called for the reading of the amendment. It was read.

Mr. C. said he preferred to have the word "civil" left out, as there was no reason why a party in a criminal cause should be compelled to have a jury of twelve men, if he did not want it. Leave it to the party to use the privilege as he saw fit.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG moved to amend the substitute by inserting between "by" and "jury," in the 1st line, the word "a."

Mr. VAN V. said it was true, as had been remarked, that the phrase "trial by jury," was construed to mean a trial by twelve men. By inserting the word "a," a different construction would be given and the object attained. The motion was lost.

The question recurring on Mr. WALKER's amendment,

Mr. J. D. PIERCE wished the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. ROBERTSON] would be retained as it read. He thought what followed, clearly and sufficiently explained the meaning of the first clause.

Mr. ROBERTSON hoped the amendment of his colleague [Mr. WALKER] would not prevail. It could not be an improvement. It was feared that a common law construction would be given to his amendment, and that it would be held that a jury meant a body of twelve men. Under a precisely similar clause in the bill of rights, it had been held by the Supreme Court of the state of New York that a jury of six in a justice's court was constitutional. (If I am wrong here, said Mr. R., the learned Chief Justice will correct me.) And other courts have held the same. He agreed with the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] as to the rule of construction. In construing this section, the whole of it must be taken together. The Supreme Court, in deciding a question arising under this section, could not take one clause and give that a construction by the rules of the common law, and throw aside the rest. This would be gross absurdity. I may be wrong, said Mr. R., in the rule of construing sentences, as I am not a constitutional lawyer, but I think not. One clause of a sentence cannot be selected, and effect given to it, and the rest cast aside entirely.

It is apprehended that one clause of the substitute proposed contradicts the other. This is not the case; it only modifies and explains the other. If the provision authorizing the Legislature to provide for a jury of less than twelve men occurred in a separate section of the constitution, then there might be room to fear this misconstruction; as it is, there is none.

Besides, in the amendment offered by my colleague, there is only a difference of verbiage.

Mr. WALKER said it was admitted by some gentlemen that the common law construction would be applied to the first clause of the substitute; yet it was argued the courts could arrive at a different conclusion. This was his objection to the proposition. While it declared the right of trial by jury should remain inviolate, in the next sentence it gave the Legislature power to reduce it—that was, to violate what was declared inviolate. It was like passing an act, and then passing another, explanatory of the first, directly opposite. He proposed by his amendment to avoid this difficulty.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I think the gentleman [Mr. WALLER] is altogether mistaken. The language used in the substitute may be an imperfect expression in the communication of thought, but the latter portion does not mean to give the power to violate the first—it is only a limitation. That rule of interpretation must apply unless we go back to the dark ages for a rule.

A division of the question being called for, the motion to strike out was lost.

The question then being on the adoption of the substitute,

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to amend by striking out the word "civil."

Mr. FRALICK hoped the amendment would prevail. He thought the legislature should have authority to authorize a jury of a less number than twelve in all minor cases.

Mr. ROBERTSON said his object was to provide in one section for civil, and in another, for criminal causes.

Mr. R. then read a proposition relating to criminal causes, which, he said, he intended to offer at the proper time.

Mr. PIERCE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. GOODWIN said, with the views he entertained, he could not concur in the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON.] In superior courts, he thought parties should have a right to waive a jury, and the right to demand a jury of twelve men, if they required it; but in inferior courts, particularly justices' courts, juries of a less number might be authorized by the legislature.

A division of the question being called for, section 9 was stricken out, and the substitute of Mr. ROBERTSON was adopted.

GRAND JURY.

Section 10 being under consideration, the Chair stated the question to be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN:] "the institution of the grand jury is hereby abolished."

Mr. GOODWIN said—Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The section as it now stands is not as in the old bill of rights, but leaves it discretionary with the Legislature to continue or dispense with the grand jury, as in their judgment may seem proper.

If this proposition be adopted, the Legislature will be prohibited from authorizing a grand jury in any case. It proposes a fundamental change in the law of the land, and strikes down an institution venerable for its antiquity, imposing in its character, and dear to us by associations with which it is inseparably connected. If, sir, the system is inexpedient, if it fails to accomplish the objects for which it was intended, or has become perverted from its legitimate use and purpose, then let us find some other mode better adapted to secure the rights of individuals and the requirements of justice; but until some other mode, better adapted to the ends for which it was instituted, is found, let us not hastily and inconsiderately resolve to abolish the grand jury.

I have said, sir, it was an institution venerable for its antiquity. It is a conservative institution—conservative of the peace, of the good order of society, and highly conservative of individual rights—conservative in the sense in which your judges and justices are styled conservators of the peace. It was so understood at the period when Magna Charta was wrested from the English crown—so regarded in the days of our revolution, and inserted in the constitutions of all the States—thus placed beyond the power of the Legislatures—and in the Constitution of the United States.

It has been remarked, sir, that the necessity which gave rise to the grand jury has ceased to exist; that inasmuch as monarchical institutions do not exist in our land, there is no use in its continuance; but let me ask, if under the mode suggested in lieu of it, prosecutions through the agency of prosecuting attorneys and justices of the peace only—there will be no danger that groundless complaints will be preferred, that individuals will be arraigned on insufficient and unfounded charges, and the very abuses of which gentlemen complain be increased, yea, increased tenfold.

Why may not frivolous and malicious complaints be made before justices as well as grand juries? The same motives exist, and the same passions will govern mankind. And how can the danger be diminished with the numerous justices scattered throughout the country, with their generally limited information and experience in respect to criminal laws, criminal proceedings, and the evidence in such cases requisite? Would not the means of harassing citizens be vastly increased, and the cases multiplied which the institution of the grand jury is intended and calculated to prevent?

Let us look, for a moment, at the nature of the grand jury. Their action is not final. Gentlemen seem to have supposed, in their reasoning, that they try causes, and that their determination is conclusive. Their province is merely that of inquiry—to ascertain whether there is sufficient evidence of crime to require that the person charged should be put on trial, and in such cases to present the accusation by indictment. They are selected under the laws, as it is expressed, from the "body of the county," from the mass of its citizens interested in the good order of the community, and the due and correct administration of the laws. They receive the charge of a judge familiar with the subject, as to the duties they are required to perform, the laws in relation to crime, and the requisite evidence, and if there are any special matters from occurrences within the county, requiring their investigation, he is informed of it by the prosecuting attorney or otherwise, and adapts his charge accordingly. And it is a rule, which is given in charge to them, that to find a bill in a particular case, the evidence must be such as would be sufficient on its face, if uncontradicted and unimpeached, to convict before a traverse jury. Further, if in any matter before them the grand jury have any doubt as to the law relating to it or the proper evidence, they can obtain the necessary information from the court. I consider this fact an answer to the statement that justices of the peace are better informed in this respect than grand jurors. Whatever the general intelligence and respectability of the former, they cannot, in inquiries of this nature, have the advantages possessed by grand juries.

When the grand jury come together, it is among their powers and duties to inquire into matters relating to the civil police of the county, the manner in which those entrusted with public affairs have discharged their duties, the administration of the school laws, those relating to highways, and generally everything connected with the good order of society; and this, independent of presentments in particular cases, is highly important and effective. There is a moral power in the periodical meeting and inquiry of grand juries, which, in my view, has great influence, and is highly valuable. I consider, sir, we obtain an ample compensation for their expense in this consideration. So much in regard to the nature and object of grand juries.

I cannot think, sir, that any member on this floor, will be willing to leave it to prosecuting attorneys to judge solely whether a prosecution shall be commenced, or proceedings instituted against a citizen. This would be too much like, too closely allied to, the odious Star Chamber process, when officers of the King's household were permitted to designate victims at their own will.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, the only other mode proposed—that suggested by the gentleman from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN,]—is to have an examination before justices—the justices to certify that there is probable cause of prosecution; and on this certificate the prosecuting attorney is to file an information in lieu of an indictment. And let me ask members if they are willing to leave it to justices to say, solely, after examination, whether a party shall be subjected to trial? There are in most of the counties some eighteen townships, and this would give about seventy justices in each county, before each one of whom complaints might be entered. Would this system, sir, give less latitude to personal malice, to harassing complaints, petty and insufficient causes, and tend less to put in jeopardy individual character and right, than by the intervention of grand juries? If the grand jury perform their duty faithfully, they inquire fully into all the facts connected with the case, and if these, when fully ascertained, furnish sufficient grounds, they make a presentment; if not, proceedings against a party there terminate. True, they do not hear the defense—their object is that of inquiry in the first instance, to ascertain whether a charge should be preferred.

But it is said the grand jury is secret, and therefore objectionable. This I consider one of the incidents that tend to its value. From the very fact of secrecy they are enabled more fully to investigate. It furnishes them with the means to ferret out combinations and conspiracies to violate the laws, and thereby bring offenders to justice; and this, when it could not be otherwise effected. Further, by means of it, investigations are made without subjecting the jurors, parties or witnesses to the resentment or animosity of those whose conduct may fall under their inquiries, and renders the inquiry of the jury room more full and free. And their province being that of inquiry merely, if they find no cause for indictment, this being in such cases kept within the counsels of the jury room, occasions no injury to character or wound to individual feeling. Gentlemen have said that in this way groundless indictments have been found, and prosecutions instituted upon charges preferred from malicious motives, and cases have been stated. Such may have been—such do sometimes occur. I have known one of the kind where a prosecution was instituted against a worthy citizen upon the complaint of a grand juror, (who was so far forgetful of his duty,) upon evidence which was supposed to exist, but was not before the jury, and had in fact no existence, and where the charge, as the event fully proved, was without foundation. Yet this only proves that with all the guards thrown around them, with all the protection in the number and character of the men, the mode of their selection, the oath they take and the charge they receive, some such cases cannot be prevented. It only shows that human nature is such that the best institutions may sometimes be perverted to evil; and if this may be done under this system, how much more under that suggested as a substitute?

The grand jury has been a theme of eulogy, of admiration and of praise, from the days in which it was first instituted, down to the present period—from the time when it first took into its keeping the general good order of society and the protection of individual right.

I, sir, call upon members of this Convention to pause before tearing down this time-honored institution. Public opinion has not called for it, and does not expect it at our hands. True, some gentlemen have remarked that in their particular neighborhoods and in certain sections, a feeling prevails adverse to it; but only one petition has been sent in to us relative to it, and as it respects my own knowledge, I never heard the subject even named until I came within this hall. Several matters of reform were discussed through the papers, and by the citizens generally; such as biennial sessions of the Legislature, the election of officers by the people, the election of the judiciary, and so on: they were expected and well understood; yet not a word was said in regard to abolishing the grand jury.

We are not here to make changes where public opinion does not require it; to change fundamental laws when they have not been brought in question; at least not unless the change is clearly necessary to meet the wants of the people, and keep pace with the progress of the times. No such necessity exists in this case; and I contend that public opinion has not been sufficiently directed to it, the question not sufficiently discussed to justify members in coming to conclusions to which some of them incline. In the county of Wayne I have never even heard the subject mentioned, and must confess I was taken by surprise when I heard the proposition here; but until I can obtain more satisfactory evidence, more convincing proof, than I at present possess, that there is public feeling against the system, I cannot believe that one in ten, nay ninety-nine in one hundred of our citizens are opposed to it, and demand a change. Gentlemen, doubtless, are familiar with the views of persons in their own counties; but I can assure them the subject has not been canvassed in the county which I have the honor, in part, to represent.

In regard, sir, to the question of expense, there must be some in calling the grand jury together two or three times during the year; so in fact in regard to any other system; but abolish it, and it seems to me you will find this but a drop in the bucket compared to what would result if the proposition of the gentleman from Cass [Mr. SULLIVAN] should be adopted. Would not motives of interest, as well as others, operate? Would not "reasonable causes" of prosecution multiply, and expenses accumulate, by fees of justices, sheriffs, constables, witnesses, and other charges? The court of the police justice in the city of Detroit originated in this very fact. Under the present system of complaints before justices, the expenses arising from the numerous cases before them had become an onerous tax and a serious evil, and it was to be rid of this that the project was started and consummated, of having a single police justice and taking away wholly the criminal jurisdiction of other justices, and also abolishing, in respect to it, the mode of compensation by fees, and providing a salary. Even in this respect, the expense with us there is against the system suggested.

Let gentlemen, then, look at the two systems side by side in reference to the administration of public justice, the preservation of peace and order, the protection of the public interests and of individual right, and say whether that of the grand jury, administered under the laws, according to the true spirit and objects of the institution, is not in every respect superior?

In conclusion, I trust this Convention will not assume the responsibility of adopting the amendment and abolishing the grand jury. The mode of selecting grand jurors may not be as perfect as it can be made. A certain number are required to be drawn and returned, and if the assessors are careful in their selections of names, we should seldom fail to obtain proper men. But if the plan of selecting does not ensure a grand jury of the proper character, let us ask the Legislature to amend it. I will go, heart and hand, with any one in such a measure until the system is perfected, and we can be certain of having grand juries composed of proper men—men who will look with a single eye to the interests of the community and the protection of individual rights. Under existing circumstances, I should dislike to see it abolished. It would seem to me like tearing down some ancient building that has given us shelter from wind and storm, that has protected us for ages from the fierce blast, and consigning it to destruction without due reflection or necessity. I hope, sir, it may be retained, still to be a refuge and protection in time to come.

Mr. BEARDSLEY was in favor of abolishing the grand jury system. If it was an ancient system, that was no reason why it should be retained. If institutions were venerable and useful for the reason of their antiquity, there was no object in the American revolution. The government from which the colonies separated, themselves was an ancient one, and therefore better than our own. Many old systems had been abolished by the governments of the different States, and it had never been regretted; there was no desire to renew them. The arguments of the gentleman would lead back to the old system of government, and destroy our republican institutions. Nine times out of ten, a justice was called on to issue a warrant against an accused person. The grand jury was seldom applied to as the first instrument to bring a criminal to justice. He considered them unnecessary, inasmuch as he believed a criminal could be brought to trial without any proceeding now necessary before grand juries. The ends of justice could be more readily and more cheaply attained. The expense of calling grand juries should be brought into consideration, especially if they could be dispensed with. He believed that the duties of prosecuting attorneys would not be more, if so much, as at present, if the system was abolished. The remarks of the gentleman, that justices might be partial and corrupt, was no argument in favor of the system. He [Mr. B.] believed that the duties of justices could be so plainly directed by law, that little difficulty could be apprehended on that point.

Mr. J. BARTOW inquired how those gentlemen who advocated the abolition of grand juries, would get along with the 5th article of the amendments to the constitution of the United States, which prescribes that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger."

Mr. CHURCH said he would refer the gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. BARTOW,] to the 7th volume of Peters' Reports; the page and the name of the case he did not now recollect; in which case the delegate would find a decision of Chief Justice Marshall, in substance as follows:

The provisions of the 5th amendment to the constitution of the U. S. (embracing the clause relative to indictments by grand juries,) are intended solely as a limitation on the exercise of power by the government of the United States. The constitution was ordained and established by the people of the U. S. for themselves—for their own government; and not for the government of the individual States. Each State established a constitution for itself, and in that constitution provided such limitations and restrictions on the powers of its particular government as its judgment dictated. The people of the U. S. framed such a government for the United States as they supposed best calculated to promote their interests. The powers they conferred on this government were to be exercised by itself; and the limitations on power, if expressed in general terms, are naturally and necessarily applicable to the government created by the instrument. They are limitations of power granted in the instrument itself; not of distinct governments framed by different persons and for different purposes.

Mr. SULLIVAN said that the delegate from Genesee would find in the case referred to by the delegate from Kent, a full explanation of the difficulty he had suggested, and that by no means could the amendment conflict with the proposed action of this body.

Mr. WALKER offered the following as a substitute to the amendment of Mr. SULLIVAN:

"All justices of the peace shall be, by virtue of their office, grand jurors; and when complaint shall be made to any one of said grand jurors that a criminal offence has been committed, upon sufficient evidence to induce the belief that the accused may be guilty of an offence not cognizable by a justice of the peace, then such juror shall associate with him two other grand jurors within the county, and cause the accused to be brought before them for examination; and upon such examination the accused shall have a right to make a full defence; and if it shall appear upon such examination, after a full hearing, that there is a reasonable cause to believe the accused is guilty of the offence charged against him, then such jurors shall transmit a certified copy of the proceedings and evidence before them, to the prosecuting attorney of the county, and he shall draw a bill of indictment against the accused, for the offence charged, and cause the accused to be arraigned for trial thereon."

Mr. W. said the proposition embraced a system which had been considered and adopted by a large and respectable meeting of citizens of Macomb county, as a substitute for the grand jury, and transmitted to him. He offered it as he had received it, and although he might not be willing to adopt all the provisions as applicable in all cases, yet he considered the plan worthy the attention and reflection of the Convention.

Mr. CORNELL—The gentleman [Mr. WALKER] seems to have forgotten the purpose for which he is sent here. We are not here to legislate, to enact laws. The proposition consists too much in detail to be embraced in a constitution.

Mr. WALKER thought that before tearing down an old building, it was necessary to make some provision, to adopt some plan in its place.

Mr. CORNELL—Admit it for the sake of argument, yet it is not necessary to say who shall be grand jurors.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE thought the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] was a proper subject of consideration.

He rose, however, to say a few words in reply to the member from Wayne, [Mr.

GOODWIN.] That gentleman seemed to think, because the institution of the grand jury was ancient and venerable, it should be retained. He would ask if there were not other institutions, equally venerable for their antiquity, grievous and oppressive? yet, if the argument were good in the one case it must be equally so in the other. The English nobility was an ancient and venerable institution, but this was no reason why it should be adopted here. So we might go back to the days of Nimrod and trace down to the present period many venerable and ancient customs, despotic and monarchical; and would their antiquity be considered a sufficient reason for their adoption? He thought not.

He believed the institution of the grand jury to be inconsistent with liberty. A party accused had an inalienable right to confront the witnesses against him; and before the grand jury this right was denied. As he had before stated, he was for abolishing the system—he believed the wisdom of man was sufficient to invent some system more consistent with liberty.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I feel called upon to remonstrate against the destruction of the institution of the grand jury. I am against the proposition of the gentleman from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN,] and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER,] but would prefer to see the section of the old constitution on this subject restored to its relative position in the new.

The objections to the grand jury seem to resolve themselves into two—its expense, and its secret and inquisitorial character.

With regard to the expense, I draw an entirely different inference from the gentlemen who have preceded me. I view it as a cheap guarantee of the public peace and public safety. What are the facts? The late very provident Legislature, which so bountifully provided this Convention with nothing to facilitate its business, did order one little document to throw light upon our investigations, the report of the Secretary of State relative to the expenses of our courts. I find that the expense of the grand jury was the enormous sum of $3,871, for the year 1849.

Mr. PIERCE inquired if the amounts paid were all reported.

Mr. WILLIAMS—From all the counties except Mackinac and St. Clair, against which are marked "no report."

Now, what is this gigantic expense, under which the State is groaning? Why, allow that we have 387,100 people, (and our population greatly exceeds that number,) it would amount, if assessed per capita, to the alarming sum of one cent per annum to each individual. Abolish the grand jury, and your share and mine together, sir, saved by this retrenchment, would be sufficient to buy a glass of small beer. You may double it—treble it—quadruple it, and the gentleman from Calhoun is welcome to all the argument he can make from the expense.

There are many institutions, and much of the machinery of governments, which admit of no valuation by dollars and cents. I doubt not the very existence of the great stone building at Jackson, by the terror it inspires, saves the State annually many times its cost. It is so with many of the defences of civil society. The whole revenue cutter service of the United States is a preventive service. It would task the government to show by dollars and cents that the amount it saved was equal to its cost. Yet, it makes a gigantic item in the annual treasury budget. There is such a thing as saving at the tap and losing at the bung-hole. There is such a thing as being penny wise and pound foolish, and it appears to me that we are exemplifying the truth of this homely maxim. Why, a single building saved from the torch of the midnight incendiary, might exceed in value the aggregate cost of the whole grand jury system to the State.

I trust I am not opposed to progress, and to those rational reforms the Convention is authorized to perfect. But mere innovation is not reform. Destruction is not progress. Before this institution is abolished let us be furnished with a substitute, some equally searching method for the investigation of crime. Why not, if change is demanded, provide some collateral plan of effecting the same objects? Let the grand jury system remain in force, and if you wish to experiment, give the community some other method to reach the same end. If your substitute has answered the purpose, the grand jury will become a dead letter, and it will be time enough to obliterate it entirely when another Convention shall be called to revise again the constitution.

No substitute has been offered, though some kinds of partial substitutes have been hinted at. The argument is that the whole business can be safely entrusted to a prosecuting attorney and justices of the peace. Now, for one, I should not regard the interests and peace of society safe for one moment in the hands of these functionaries. They would often be entirely unfit for so responsible trusts. I mean no disrespect to the dozen ex-prosecuting attorneys, nor the fifty ex-justices on this floor; but I will leave it to those who have been decimated and sent here, whether they have not left behind them scores who are entirely unfit depositories of justice.

Will the ends of justice be answered if crime is to be investigated by single justices and prosecuting attorneys? No. The justice may be ignorant, irresolute or corrupt. The complaining witness may be timid and reluctant, and he may be confronted by desperate and organized gangs, who will overawe and intimidate both officer and court. I have seen men accused of crime almost ask that a warrant might be issued against them, because they might overawe the justice, while they despaired of escaping the rigid and independent scrutiny of a grand jury, and a trial by a more solemn tribunal.

I reside on the borders of Indiana. In times past there have been confederated gangs of counterfeiters and horse thieves along the border of our State, from Lake Erie to Lake Michigan, flitting from one State to the other—concocting plans in one State to be put in execution in another. Now, I ask, what could be done towards the punishment of such gangs by commencing proceedings in open court? We all know by observation the sympathetic cords that draw rogues together, and how instinctively they fly to the rescue of each other. "Birds of a feather flock together." All that portion of the neighborhood who sympathize with the criminal, throw their weight into the scale to shield him and defeat the ends of justice. A few years since a formidable band was ferreted out and broken up in the counties of Hillsdale and St. Joseph. The delegates from Hillsdale doubtless recollect the case I allude to. It required all the energy and vigilance of the officers, all the secrecy and ingenuity of the grand jury, to unravel knot after knot of the evidence, and bring them to justice; a justice's court, or an open examination, would have been as spiders' meshes around them, and I believe that without the grand jury they could not have been brought to justice. So bold and desperate had they become, they shot at the sheriff's posse in open daylight.

The only substitute for a grand jury that has been hinted at, being elective officers, let us see what must be the result. If society relies upon a prosecuting attorney, and he is made elective, as he is sure to be under the constitution we are now framing, he may owe his election to a dozen votes of men whom it is his duty to bring to justice. You will find that the rogues in the community will invariably throw their votes for the most timid, or the most corrupt, or the weakest man. Whichever party nominates the most incompetent man, will be surest of success. So of justices. In such hands society cannot be safe.

It has been argued that when the reason of a thing ceases, the thing itself should cease—"Ratione cessante, cessat lex." I studied a little law once, and I believe that was the law Latin maxim. I maintain the reason of the thing has not ceased. There may be as much necessity for the interposition of this shield to protect a citizen from the malice or caprice of the prosecuting officer as ever. A confederated gang, such as I have described, might crush the single individual. My friend from Cass [Mr. SULLIVAN] says that in this secret council of the grand jury, men gratify their malevolence. I do not know how it may be with some grand juries. I never was upon more than one, and so far from being the instrument of injustice in that instance, I believe that the jury were able to ferret out the truth with unerring certainty, and to separate at a glance the cases instigated by malice from those complaints prompted by an honest pursuit of justice.

From the case mentioned by the gentleman from Jackson, [Mr. CORNELL,] and the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] that a person had appeared before a grand jury as a witness when he was guilty of the crime himself, I draw an entirely different inference from those gentlemen.

Mr. CORNELL—I merely stated a fact and left the inference to the Convention.

Mr. WILLIAMS resumed—At any rate the gentleman from Calhoun drew an inference hostile to the grand jury. Now I would like to know if the same witness would not have had a far greater chance of success before a single man. He was doubtless detected by the superior sagacity of the many over the few. Two heads are said to be better than one; are not twenty-three? At any rate, I should rather trust them. It is difficult to deceive them; they are removed far from those influences which affect single individuals, depending on the votes of the accused, perhaps, for re-election.

It has been said that public opinion demands the destruction of the grand jury. So says my friend from Cass. Now I do not wish to be impertinent, nor to interfere or speak for that gentleman's constituents, but I will say that our constituents mingle daily together, and I have never heard, till I arrived at this Convention, one solitary lisp of disapproval of the grand jury. So far from my own constituents being opposed to it, I believe that if on this question had been staked the issue of having a Convention, a majority would have voted against it. We were convened to promote various measures of reform. There are some demanded by the people of the State with almost entire unanimity; such as biennial sessions of the legislature, the district system of representation, and a change in the judiciary system. With regard to those, this Convention is virtually instructed. But with regard to this subject we have no such instructions. With the exception of the petition from the county of Calhoun, presented the other day by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] a vote of the grand jury of Ionia, and some manifestations of displeasure in Jackson, we have no expression of opinion on this subject. The gentleman from Wayne [the President] is as clear in his belief in regard to his large constituency, that they demand and expect no change, as I am in regard to my own constituency in St. Joseph. Why has the public press been silent? Where are all the petitions? From whence comes any loud clamor for reform of this evil? There is in fact, sir, no such public expression as will warrant this violent contemplated change.

It is said that the institution is secret and inquisitorial. It is proposed to let day light in upon all investigation of crime, and for whose benefit? For the benefit of those who concoct their plans in secret, sometimes beyond your jurisdiction, to be put in execution on your territory; who steal your horses in secret; who rob you in secret; who set fire to your dwelling in darkness and in secret; and who murder you in secret; whose whole means and appliances are secret; and sir, shall society not employ secrecy to head, to circumvent, to anticipate and to punish its enemies? Sir, the argument from secrecy is all moonshine. Common sense dictates its use. In the civil administration of government, secrecy is often observed. Secrecy is absolutely indispensable in the prosecution of military and naval operations. In this very building, in the Executive department, secrecy is observed, if the publication of what transpires is not conducive to the public weal. So far from being censurable, I regard the employment of secrecy as laudable in the ferreting out of crime, and society would pursue a suicidal policy if it rejected its use. It is the very soul of every well organized system of police. For what is government instituted? For the protection of us all. For your protection and mine, sir; and government abandons its duty and sacrifices us all, when it ceases to use every efficient and honorable method to protect us, open or secret.

As the policy of this innovation is doubtful, and as the arguments in favor of the grand jury preponderate, I would retain it for reasons which I should not consider sound, if it was really proved to be dangerous or burdensome. I would retain it, as the gentleman from Wayne [the President] would, for its associations. It is a part of the British constitution, or of those customs, traditions and precedents, held sacred as the British constitution. Omitted in the original constitution of the United States, it was demanded by the several States, and now stands among the first amendments. The gentleman from Wayne says it is found in almost all the constitutions of the several States. I had supposed it was secured in all. I found it in all that I examined, and I had supposed that it followed every where, all over the globe, wherever the Anglo Saxon race had a foothold. It is one of those institutions which the Anglo Saxons every where cherish with pride, with affection, with undying tenacity. It has followed the Anglo Saxon race as a shadow. It is one of the mile stones that mark their progress in constitutional law and constitutional liberty. As a citizen of Michigan, I would not reject one of the noble characteristics of the race of which it is our pride and boast to be a part. The attempt to change a feature in our constitution, which has stood the test of centuries, is at least hazardous. To substitute another plan may prove quackery. But, say what you will; cavil as much as you may; notwithstanding all that has been said about public opinion, I believe it is an institution that enjoys the popular regard, the popular sympathy, and the popular confidence. If an immigrant of the same origin as ourselves, lands on our soil, does he not deem a residence among us more eligible, if he finds rooted among us those historical and time hallowed institutions with which he is as familiar as with household words. Here is an institution, simple, intelligible and safe; one to which he knows where and how he is amenable, and one which throws its protection around his person, and his property, and his life. Would not such a man cherish his home as more dear, and his rights more secure, in consequence of its preservation and existence among us?

Mr. GOODWIN said he had been misunderstood by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE.] He [Mr. G.] did not argue that the grand jury should be retained because it was an ancient and venerable institution; he distinctly stated, if the system did not answer the purposes for which it was instituted, he would go, heart and hand, with any one to perfect it; but until some system should be proposed which he considered better adapted to secure the ends for which the grand jury was organized, he should oppose its abolition.

If reform were called for in this measure, as in the case of the English nobility and other institutions to which the gentleman [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] had alluded, why had it not been manifested through the public press, public meetings and discussions?

In addition to what had been remarked by the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] in regard to the detection of a gang of horse thieves, he would state that a case came within his own knowledge, where a band of counterfeiters were ferreted out and broken up by a grand jury, and which he believed could not have been effected otherwise.

Mr. CRARY said the petition presented by him to abolish the grand jury system was the only one before the Convention. It came from his own neighborhood, and was signed by members of the legal profession and citizens who had served on grand juries and had seen their operations.

He would not predict the final action of the Convention, but thought they would not adopt the requirements of the present constitution. If those requirements had conformed to the common law, or the constitution of the United States, it was not probable that any call would have been made for the abolition of the grand jury at this time. The welfare of the community did not require the grand jury to take cognizance of minor offences.

The delegate from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] mentioned one grand jury that ferreted out a band of counterfeiters. In the instance referred to he does not tell how much was effected by the vigilance and activity of the then prosecuting attorney. One case, however, did not prove the necessity of the system, for there had been more than one band of counterfeiters in the State.

He had no feeling of veneration for the institution. He could willingly vote to abolish it, if called for by public opinion. A substitute could readily be furnished that would be equally efficient and far less expensive. Minor offences should be disposed of before the single justice. Another class could be disposed of by information as well as by indictment. Even in aggravated offences it was now the practice to go first before the magistrate to make complaint. On a hearing, the magistrate bound over for probable cause, and the case then went to the grand jury. If malice was to be gratified, the law now gave full scope for the gratification of that feeling. The resort to the grand jury in the first instance was generally in those cases where there was no danger of the escape of the offender. Too many of the complaints made to grand juries had their origin in private malice. Often they were made to gain undue advantage.

The institution was not perfect. It could be left to be improved by the legislature, or abolished, and a different system substituted. He ought not, perhaps, to vote on the question, as his mind might be biased by early predilections. He had seen the operation of a different system—one where the fundamental law gave the right to a grand jury in only two classes of cases. He knew that such a system was efficient in bringing offenders to justice, and was attended with none of the evils anticipated. It resembled the plan proposed by the delegate from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER.] Such a plan could be made to operate well, if public sentiment was prepared to receive it. With such a system, he was ready to abolish the present institution. So far as the wishes of his constituents were known, he was called upon to vote to abolish, leaving it to the legislature to furnish a substitute, and knowing that a good substitute could be furnished, he would so vote, rather than have the system we had lived under the past fifteen years.

Mr. HASCALL said he thought it impossible to state precisely what public opinion was, in regard to the subject under consideration; as yet it had not been manifested either through the public journals or the conventions of the people. He, however, confessed that his individual opinion was, that very serious objections might be urged against the institution of the grand jury; not only on account of its cost, but also on account of the secret and ex parte character of its action. He believed all secret institutions to be dangerous and pernicious in their tendency, and especially at variance with the theory of our government. A venerable precedent had no charm to him, any farther than it conformed to principle, and subserved the ends of judicious public policy. It was only to be respected when it would bear the test of reason, and in its action contribute to the general good. He was not, however, ready to say that this institution should be absolutely abolished by a positive provision of the constitution. He would rather leave it open to the legislature to abolish it or not, when public opinion could be ascertained in regard to it. If its abolition should be found to operate badly, and no good substitute could be found, it would then be easy to restore it; if abolished by the Constitution, it could only be restored by an amendment, after much time and great inconvenience. He thought in cases of high crimes, involving the punishment of death or imprisonment for life, it might be well to require that the accused should be put upon his trial by the indictment of a grand jury, and he would therefore offer the following as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN,] which he hoped would meet the views of the committee and avoid the necessity of further discussion: "The legislature may abolish the grand jury in all cases except where the crime charged is punishable with death or imprisonment for life."

Mr. SULLIVAN remarked that gentlemen had urged as a strong reason against the abolition of the grand jury system, that it had not been demanded by the public. He could not admit that the bare fact that no decided evidence of popular sentiment had been furnished to the convention, afforded any ground for inaction. He freely subscribed to the doctrine, that the representative is bound by the will of his constituents, so far as it is known. Where it is unknown, he must act according to the light of his own judgment, and take the risk of consequences. Who knows what kind of judiciary system the people want? Whether an independent supreme court, or a nisi prius system? He doubted whether any member of the Convention had reliable evidence upon that point; and yet a system must be framed and submitted for their approval or rejection. It had been urged that the institution of the grand jury was an ancient one. He did not deny that some importance was due to that consideration. When an institution has been of long continuance, it ought not to be rashly withdrawn; but where the reasons against it are strong and clear, the duty of a public servant is plain. It would very little become wise men, assembled to consult for the common good, to sacrifice that object to mere sentimentality. We have not met here to offer an indiscriminating reverence to the past. We are here upon a work of reform; to correct the records of the past, and to frame a constitution of government adapted to the progressive spirit and ideas of the times. Let us bring measures to the standard of truth and reason. The present generation of men have as much capacity to judge of the tendencies of measures as those which have preceded. We have vastly better means of judging, because we have their experience added to our own. If the institution of a grand jury is an ancient one, that of monarchy (as has been well stated by the gentleman from Calhoun, Mr. J. D. PIERCE,) is yet older. If the institution of a grand jury is an imposing one, the trappings of monarchy and nobility are yet more imposing. We have been reminded by the gentleman from Wayne, [the President,] that the institution of the grand jury is secured by the constitution of the United States, and by those of most of the States of the Union. While we reverence, as we ought, the constitution of the United States, we must remember that it was the work of fallible and imperfect men—great men indeed—but yet men. He had looked into the constitution of the United States, and found there a provision that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. He found a further provision that they should be appointed by the Executive, by and with the consent of the Senate. Are we prepared to adopt these provisions? If not, let us not take it as authority from which it is little less than treason to dissent in reference to this particular measure, while we disavow its authority in reference to other and very important measures. Almost every constitution which has been recently formed, contained new provisions. He was entirely mistaken if very important alterations were not made in our present system; if, for example, the structure of the judiciary system was not essentially changed.

When he addressed the committee at a former period, he took occasion to remark that the institution of a grand jury was an expensive one. He did not pretend that this afforded any argument against its continuance, if it brought any compensating benefit. If otherwise, it did. We are here principally, perhaps, to provide for a retrenchment of public expenditures, and the matter of expense in this case deserves consideration. The gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] had referred to a document on our tables, from which it appears that the amount paid to grand jurors is only between three and four thousand dollars a year. A large number of counties are not included in that statement—no returns have been received from them. Admitting, however, its fullness and accuracy, so far as it goes, it includes a very small portion of the expenses of a grand jury system. It includes only the amount paid to the grand jurors themselves—not the sheriffs' fees in summoning them, and subpoenaing witnesses, nor the fees of witnesses themselves. Suppose, however, three thousand dollars covered the whole expense; is that a sum so insignificant as to excite our contempt? Sir, any conventional body, or any legislative body, that yields to such a course of argumentation, will find itself plunged into boundless expense. The world is made up of atoms. It is only by attending to items that we can save any thing in the aggregate. Suppose the salary of a judge of the supreme court was four thousand dollars, and he were to propose to reduce it to three, could it not be urged with equal force, one thousand dollars is a sum too small to be regarded—it is a tax upon the citizen too paltry to be felt? So every proposed retrenchment could be combated, and no reform in public expenditures could ever be adopted. It has been denied that the expense of the existing system is equal to that of the proposed one. Let us analyze a little this matter of expense. We will suppose that two hundred examinations are to take place in twenty different counties, allowing ten cases to each of the counties. Suppose the matter goes before a magistrate; his fees in each case are, on an average, perhaps, from seventy-five cents to a dollar. Call them a dollar, (and there must be magistrates enough here to correct him if the estimate was incorrect,) we had, then, two hundred cases examined by magistrates for two hundred dollars. Suppose the cases had gone to grand juries; no cal-culatation could be made by which the expense of each grand jury could be reduced below one hundred and fifty dollars. We had, then, grand jury expenses of three thousand dollars to set off against magistrates' fees of two hundred dollars.

This, however, is not all. Witnesses, if taken to the county seat, are to be paid their travelling expenses from the scene of crime, which may be fifteen or twenty miles distant; whereas, if the examination is before a magistrate, it will be in the vicinity of the spot where the offence is committed, and expenses will be proportionably diminished. The same thing is true in regard to officers' fees—their traveling fees under the proposed system will be only to a neighboring magistrate, while under the existing system they are to the county seat, which may be considerably distant. These remarks are all made upon the assumption that the difference in the matter of expense is only the difference between the cost of grand jury and justices' examinations; whereas, under existing regulations, it is necessary in a vast number of cases to encounter the expense of both tribunals.

When he addressed the Convention before, he alluded to the fact that the examination before the grand jury was secret—that it was an anomaly in judicial proceedings—that the best security for the faithful performance of judicial duties was publicity; so that if fraud, or partiality, or corruption existed, the world could see it. It has been urged, however, that the force of the objection is lost, from the circumstance that the grand jury proceedings are merely preliminary. It is true, they are preliminary. But are they therefore unimportant? If so, we had better dispense with them. If important at all, the examination ought to be full and public. It is urged that secrecy is necessary to secure criminals. Granted; but when is it needed? It is previous to the arrest—for that object accomplished, the argument for secrecy ceases. Cannot a complaint be made to a magistrate, a warrant issued and a criminal arrested with much more secrecy than he can be taken by virtue of proceedings before a grand jury? Can twenty-three men keep a secret better than one? Will a body of men, known to be assembled for the purpose of ferreting out criminals, be less narrowly watched than all the various magistrates of the county? In the present careless mode of selecting grand juries, corruption often enters the grand jury room—accomplices in villainy are often there, and reveal everything to their fellows.

Is it not a fact that most cases presented to the grand jury in the first place, are of an inferior grade, while those of a more aggravated stamp come to them from the magistrates?

It is urged by the gentleman from Wayne [the President] that the jury derive important help from the charge of an able and learned judge. The benefit derived from the charge is small. The charge of the judge is generally a shot at random. He does not know what particular matters may be under consideration before the grand jury; and it is ten chances to one whether it has any applicability to the business before them. Besides, it is necessarily of too general a character to afford much help to their investigations.

It has been urged that under the proposed system groundless prosecutions will be instituted. There are precisely the same facilities for making them now. The existence of a grand jury does not prevent complaints before a magistrate. It is to the grand jury, however, that groundless accusations are most likely to be made, because a man may hope at least that he stabs in the dark, and that no eye can see the hand which wields the dagger. It is there that malevolence will seek to be gratified, because it is shielded by darkness from public scorn.

It has been urged by the gentleman from Wayne [the President] that a grand jury often rescues an innocent man from the infamy of a public accusation. If this were so, it would accomplish a noble object. But the fact is different; the charge is certain to be made public—witnesses are not sworn to secrecy—they disclose to their acquaintances the testimony they have given—it is known to the public—it is carried to every part of the county. The secrecy before the grand jury is only as to the general mode of proceeding before them, a matter which it is most important should be public; about results there is none.

It is urged that under the proposed system inducements are held out to prosecuting officers to draw up prosecutions. The particular modus operandi is not pointed out; what new facilities are afforded, or what new inducements of that character are held out by the proposed system, are not disclosed. The fact is, there is no difference between the two in this respect. Complaints for crimes can now be made to two tribunals—it is proposed to limit them to one. What earthly motive or facility does it present for drumming up prosecutions? Where the prosecuting officer is allowed a salary, the more common mode of paying him, it is obviously to his advantage to have as few prosecutions as possible under either system. It has been urged that, under the proposed system, incompetent or corrupt prosecuting attorneys will be elected; all the rogues will vote for a man of that stamp. He did not perceive the applicability of the argument to the subject under consideration. It related to an entire different matter, and that was whether prosecuting attorneys should be elected. If it had any bearing upon the grand jury system he did not perceive it. But, although the remark was outside of the case, he begged leave to suggest that the competency and integrity of the prosecuting officer which would render him obnoxious to rogues, would array on his side all the moral worth of the community. He hoped it was not questionable in any county of this State which side in such a controversy would predominate.

And now, in conclusion, he would repeat what he had said on a former occasion; that it is but justice to the accused to allow him to confront the witnesses, to cross-examine them, to give him an opportunity to prepare for trial, and to explain circumstances that seem unfavorable to him. How often does it happen that an array of circumstances are brought forward against an innocent man, which a word will explain to the satisfaction of every one. Notwithstanding all the supposed advantages of the grand jury system in sheltering a man from unfounded accusations, he would repeat the question he had put on a former occasion to the intelligence of every man, whether, if he were unjustly accused, he would prefer a secret and ex parte examination, or would he choose to meet his accusers face to face before a magistrate. The answer to this question cannot be doubtful. A full examination of evidence on both sides, before one, two, or three magistrates, would, in his opinion, be better both for the public and the accused.

He had listened attentively to the arguments on the other side, but, notwithstanding their great ability, his original opinion remained unshaken.

On motion of Mr. SKINNER, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. McLEOD, the Convention adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. COOK offered the following:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next, the Convention will hold two daily sessions; the morning sessions to commence at 8 o'clock A. M.; the afternoon sessions to commence at 2 and a half o'clock P. M.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. BRITAIN said if the member would reflect a little upon the condition of things, he would not, I am sure, press his motion at the present time. We can under the present arrangement meet and hold a session of four or four and a half hours every day, giving us plenty of time to finish the business that we have previously matured elsewhere. And I would ask the member, if he does not think it better to prepare his resolutions in his own room, rather than here. Much of the success of this Convention must depend upon the shape in which matter is presented here; for, if bills or resolutions are presented in a crude or bad shape, with the action of one hundred different minds upon the subject, we shall make but little satisfactory progress in their correction. If there were no business before the committees, it still, at the present time, would be of no advantage to the State to have more than one session per day; but when we know that eighteen or nineteen of the committees—the most important—have not yet matured their reports, I trust this Convention will not alter its order by having two sessions per day.

Mr. COOK—I hope sir, that this resolution will be adopted. We have been here two weeks, and if we make no further progress than we did yesterday, we shall be here six months.

Mr. WHITE moved to strike out “two and a half,” and insert “three.”

Which motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. DESNOYERS, the resolution was amended by striking out “eight,” and inserting “half past eight.”

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out “two and a half,” and insert “two.”

Which motion was lost.

Mr. WHITE moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The Convention refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BRITAIN—The gentleman from Hillsdale thinks it time for us to act. I wish to inquire of him whether as much may not have been done in the afternoon, as in the four hours we speak here? Why have we not made more satisfactory progress? Because our minds have not been matured at home. What progress would the gentleman expect us to make if we were compelled to transact all our business here, under the rules of the Convention? I apprehend we should not make much progress, and that the work would not be worth paying for. I do not find my mind matured. I find it necessary to investigate, and I presume that other members find it likewise necessary; but the labors of the committees are at the present time a sufficient answer.

Mr. COOK demanded the yeas and nays, and the resolution was passed as follows:

livan, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburg, Waite, Walker, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Warden, 59.

Nays—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Church, Conner, Danforth, Eastman, Hart, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, McLeod, Roberts, Robertson, Story, Sturgis, Webster, Wells, White, Willard, Woodman, President, 27.

Mr. McLEOD offered the following:

That the use of this Hall be allowed to Mr. BIBB, of Detroit, this afternoon, to explain the views of the colored inhabitants of Michigan in reference to the elective franchise.

Mr. McC. had been informed that a convention of colored people had been held in Detroit to petition this Convention with regard to the elective franchise, and that Mr. Bibb had been appointed to represent their views, which to them were of vital importance, and had moreover been endorsed by a respectable number of the white inhabitants of the State; and it would be an act of courtesy on our part to listen to their views. The afternoon of this day (Saturday) would appear to be the most favorable time, as by the resolution we commence two sessions on Monday.

Mr. CHAPEL moved to amend by substituting 5 o'clock.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I hope that this will not grow into a precedent. If it does, we shall be requested to give up this Hall for all political questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Let them all come.

Mr. WHIPPLE—Then we shall be deprived of sitting here.

Mr. GALE—I hope the amendment will not prevail. Members of this Convention would be glad to hear Mr. BIBB speak, to hear what he has to say. There is no session this afternoon, and those who wish to hear him should not be deprived of it. Those who do not, can stay away. I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. ROBERTSON—If any good reason can be given by my colleague, [Mr. CHAPEL,] I shall vote for it; we have had no reasons as yet.

Mr. CHAPEL—I can give reasons, and can give them in a few words. I believe the subject is not properly connected with the business of the Convention. I do not know what right this Convention has to give audience upon business that does not properly belong to it. We may next have an application for a free soil meeting, next for some local question; and I am opposed to it in toto. We have business here; we were sent here by the people to fulfill the duties they imposed upon us; and we have no right to give up this Hall at any time, when we might be transacting our own business, to listen to a subject that is no way connected with our duties. I want the business that we came here to do to be done first.

Mr. LEACH—As the Convention is not to be in session this afternoon, it cannot make any difference to the business.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—If I understand the argument of my friend from Macomb, he tells us that the object of this meeting is foreign to the duties of this Convention. Is this the fact? Are not numerous petitions laid before us praying that the elective franchise may be extended to the colored people? Shall we close our ears to these petitions, which come up from our own citizens as well as the colored people? I trust not. Whatever may be the final sense of this Convention with respect to this matter, I hope that we shall not exclude from these halls the friends of the colored people, and that we shall not be called to order by members telling us that this is a subject foreign to the Convention.

I trust we are open to conviction; that we shall attend to all petitions. I am in favor of granting this Hall to the friends of the colored people, so that they may present to us their views, and if the free soil men wish us to hear their views, I am ready to hear them; and I trust that this Convention will not exclude from their sympathies the petitions of the colored people.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The question is, whether we shall grant the use of this hall to hear a petition upon an important question. And sir, I am willing to grant it, even although the petitioner has a skin darker than my own. I hold that they have the privilege and the right to make known to us their wishes and desire—to us, the servants of the people.

I am willing to hear what they have to say; as this hall is not to be occupied by an afternoon session, any member who does not choose to hear, can stay away; while on our part it is proper as a mere act of courtesy.

Mr. CHAPEL—I wish it to be understood that I am one of those plain kind of men who have nothing to say on the buncombe side, as this is one of the cases in which gentlemen fear to be misrepresented. The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH] talks largely, and very much like talking for buncombe. Now, the true policy is that this Convention should attend to its legitimate duties, and consume no more time than is absolutely necessary. The people expect that this Convention will adjourn at the end of four weeks; and here we are, day after day, making speeches for buncombe.

I am opposed, sir, to granting the use of this hall to any class of men in this State, when we can occupy it with our own legitimate business. Look at the treasury—the means are scant; we learn the fact from every department.

Now, sir, I do not wish to deprive Mr. BIBB of the use of this hall, except when we can be seated here forwarding business connected with the revision of the constitution. I hope that it will not be given up except at such times as it cannot be used with advantage by us.

Mr. McLEOD—I think that the gentleman misapprehends. The Convention said they would hold afternoon sessions from next Monday, implying by that vote, that they would not hold a session this afternoon—therefore, it will not interfere with the business of this Convention if Mr. BIBB should occupy the hall this afternoon. I confess that I am a little selfish; I presented the petitions of some Indians who call themselves civilized, and I wish to hear the arguments of Mr. BIBB.

Mr. CHAPEL—I will amend my motion by this amendment: “unless occupied by this Convention;” and I certainly shall move that we meet here at 2 o’clock.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I feel called upon in self-defence to meet the argument of my friend from Macomb. He talks very fluently upon the subject of buncombe. He has just given us a treatise upon the subject of the treasury—that we have been here two long weeks, and asks what has been done. We find him on the side of business and progress, but I would ask, sir, was this treasury speech intended for this Convention, or others? Do we not know the state of the treasury? Is not this speech intended for the ears of his constituents?

I apprehend that the citizens who ask at our hands the use of this hall, have a right to it.

The gentleman from Macomb says that when the Convention adjourns it will adjourn to meet at 2 o'clock. Does he not know that this Convention, by resolution, when it adjourns, will adjourn till Monday morning—then hold two sessions each day. We are the servants of the people—they are the sovereigns. Many citizens have affixed their names to this petition, and it is our duty to give it due consideration.

I hope that this amendment will not prevail—that the use of this hall will be granted unconditionally for the purpose asked.

Mr. CLARK—I rise to call the attention of the House to the rules. No member has a right to speak twice on the same question without leave of the House.

The amendment offered by Mr. CHAPEL was lost.

The resolution offered by Mr. McLEOD was adopted.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention went into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of Article 1, Bill of Rights, Mr. BRITAIN in the chair.

The question being on Mr. WALKER's substitute, offered yesterday, for Mr. SULLIVAN's amendment—

Mr. KINGSLEY—I am opposed to the amendment, and likewise to the substitute. It is too violent a method. People have not yet made up their minds upon the subject. It had been agitated as yet only in part of the State. If we proceed in this Convention making too many changes, not called for by the people, one part of the community will get hold of one objectionable part, another will get hold of another, and the result may be that we shall lose the result of our labors. Then, again, it looks too much like legislation. I had rather leave it as reported by the committee. Some say we will not vote to abolish the grand jury unless we know what the substitute is. It will probably be the best to leave it to the legislature, and not abolish it. Before another legislature sits here, public opinion may be formed, and the legislature can then decide. They can dispense with the powers of the grand jury in part, and if that works well, they can go further; if it does not, they can reinstate them in the same position they occupy now. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, as it is a matter that requires grave consideration.

The substitute was not adopted.

Mr. HASCALL offered the following as a substitute for Mr. SULLIVAN's amendment: "The legislature may abolish a grand jury, except for crimes where the penalty is death or imprisonment for life."

Which was not adopted.

The question then recurring on Mr. SULLIVAN's amendment, which was to add at the end of section 10, "the institution of the grand jury is hereby abolished,"

The committee refused to so amend.

Mr. SKINNER offered the following amendment, to commence section 10:

"No person shall be holden to answer for any crime, the punishment of which may be death or imprisonment for life, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in the land or naval forces, in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; and grand juries shall have cognizance of no other offences."

Mr. SKINNER—I introduce this resolution as taken, word for word, from the constitution of the State of Connecticut. I am satisfied that this Convention wants something done with the grand jury system. This has been pretty ably discussed, but it is an important subject. It is attacking an old institution, so old and so ancient that it is difficult to attack it successfully. But if the inquiry is conducted in a right spirit, it will not be unprofitable, even if it should take us some time longer. If we arrive at a satisfactory result, we shall do a great service to the State. The simple benefit of reducing the number of the traverse jury alone, will pay for the expense of this Convention.

I am satisfied that the institution of the grand jury, however beautiful in theory, is wrong radically, and works a wrong. It even, in my opinion, affects the ends for which it was instituted. It does not work the end proposed in the best manner. Whatever benefits it may have conferred at other times, at this time and in this country it is not what we want, nor does it accomplish its object. It is a cumbersome, expensive system, nor is there any reason for its peculiarities; for it is a peculiarity. What have we that bears any analogy in any other department of government? That a tribunal shall be in operation in secret, that an examination shall be held in secret, appears to me incompatible with our institutions.

I say that nothing at the present time could shield it except its antiquity. While all around us is in improvement, I do not feel bound to bow down to antiquity alone.

The very reasons which have been used in favor of the retention of grand juries appear to be fallacious. Why is it necessary that this tribunal should be conducted with secrecy? It is said, that criminals may not have an opportunity of escaping; but this pretext is fallacious. Here is a time set for the grand jury to meet—these men are all known—every man knows that at such a time such and such men will meet to ferret out criminals. If a public proclamation were made that on a particular day all the rogues would be arrested, could you catch them? If it was a new thing how would that meet the views of this Convention? Would it be well to have it known that upon a certain day a large body of men would meet to convict of crime? No sir. I was once prosecuting attorney, and while drawing up a bill against a rogue, he gave us leg bail, and we could not catch him. It is known when the grand jury sit and who they are. If the rogue thinks he is not safe he leaves for parts unknown.

It is considered as a secret, but it is for that very reason that it is more public—like a secret passed from mouth to mouth as a secret, which only gives it more publicity. The only effect it has is to permit criminals to abscond before they can be apprehended.

It likewise acts most injuriously against persons that are complained against. It is not once in one hundred times that crimes are complained of before a grand jury. When a crime has been committed, when public sentiment has been outraged, the citizens go before a justice of the peace and bind the criminal over; while the cases presented to the grand jury are not presented from motives of public justice, but to indulge a spirit of revenge, and cases are thus presented that never would have appeared before a justice of the peace, where a man can meet the testimony face to face. Perhaps the same testimony is not given as if it were an open trial.

But it is said that this is only the incipient stage. Sir, it is not so. What can be more effectual to destroy character than to procure an indictment to be found against a person? Does not his character suffer while he lies under this imputation, and can it ever be wiped off? Never. Does he then stand a fair chance for trial? No sir. The report is, such a man lies a prisoner for such an offence. Every man has formed an opinion, not sufficient to preclude him from being a jurymen, but sufficient to prevent the prisoner from having an impartial trial; and I cannot perceive any particular benefit that arises from this mode of proceeding. If a man is brought before a justice of the peace, he can probably make a sufficient defence in five minutes, and before even a rumor has gone abroad through the country; but it is not so with the grand jury—he may lie under the imputation for a long time. Thus revenge, by this machinery, may and does frequently work injury to an innocent man.

We will suppose that he has sufficiently made his defence, and is discharged. He has laid a long time under this imputation; one half after all believe that he is guilty and has escaped through some technicality. His character does not stand the same as it did before. I cannot see any benefit that we derive from it.

Then, again, it is expensive. Some gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMS] said the expense was but a few cents per head, but I think that statement must be erroneous; but true or not, that comprises but a small portion of the actual expense. I repeat, again, that all heinous crimes go before a justice; all cases of malice go before a grand jury.

One gentleman told us it had a good effect with regard to its moral bearing upon a community. I have lived in Connecticut twenty years, and I never heard of more than one or two grand juries, and never saw one in my life. And I would ask where, sir, have you a higher tone of morals? Where are criminals more speedily and surely punished. Then there is a mode without this expense, without this inconvenience. It is not, then, a new scheme to all, although it may be so to some, for nowhere is justice administered better than in the State of Connecticut.

I have not the vanity to believe that I can throw much light upon the subject, but but if I can throw in two mites I shall be thankful.

If the Convention think best to abolish the grand jury, there can be nothing in the way of a substitute safer or better than that used by the State of Connecticut. This substitute does away with a grand jury, except in cases of death or imprisonment for life; and I am willing to throw all the machinery for a guard that is possible in favor of a person thus accused—that he be tried by a grand jury, that he be tried by a jury of twelve; thus we might reconcile the two extremes of opinion in this Convention, and do away with a great share of the expense.

There are one or more grand jurors appointed in each town, whose duty it is to make complaints. They go before a justice of the peace; if necessary they bind over the accused—the accusation is made without expense—made openly—the accused has a chance of meeting his accuser openly, and the accuser has a chance of drawing up his charge properly.

Now there is a great difficulty in drawing up bills. The prosecuting attorney has to draw up bills in a hurry or keep the grand jury waiting—that is the reason why so many bills are quashed, and no wonder that it is so.

I see no propriety in the case going through two tribunals. I hope the amendment will prevail; for if we take no action the Legislature will take no action, while the present system does no good, but a deal of injury.

Mr. GOODWIN—I wish to correct a misapprehension the gentleman has fallen into. I alluded partly to the charge of the judge to the grand jury, when I spoke of the moral effect.

I will also correct a remark from the gentleman from Calhoun. He said that there ought to have been many more instances where grand juries should have found bands of counterfeiters. There were many more, but the special case to which I alluded was a case tracked out by a grand jury where any other method could not have been adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend by striking out "in the land and naval forces."

Mr. McLEOD—My friend from Monroe, who says a good many good things in a quiet way, says that this may have reference to a possible dissolution of the Union. As I am a Unionist myself, I hope it may be stricken out.

The amendment was carried.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I have a substitute to offer for the amendment, but I regret to say that I am so indisposed I am not able to discuss the subject properly. I will present it in two sections:

Sec. 1. A grand jury shall consist of not less than nine nor more than thirteen persons.

Sec. 2. No person shall be held to answer for an offence punishable by imprisonment in the State prison unless on presentment of a grand jury.

My first proposition is, to reduce the number of grand jurors to not less than nine, nor more than thirteen persons. It has been said by my acute friend from Cass, as well as other gentlemen, that the expense is very great, and that it would be much diminished if, instead of a grand jury, complaints were made before justices of the peace. I propose to remove this difficulty by the amendment. We all know that the number at present consists of twenty-three. I propose to reduce this one-half. The expenses incident to the mileage will be reduced one-half; and I give as the result of my experience, that this mode of investigating crime before a body consisting of nine persons, will be much less than the expense incident to an investigation of crime before a justice of the peace. When the proper time comes, I will go into detail; at present I have not the strength. My second proposition is, that no offences except such as are infamous, shall be cognizable by a grand jury. The difference between my proposition and that of my friend from Washtenaw, is this: his proposition is, that offences punishable with death or imprisonment for life, require the investigation of a grand jury; mine is, that all offences which are infamous in their nature, require that investigation. The same reasons which would induce the adoption of his resolution, will induce a favorable action upon the amendment which I propose. What difference is there in principle between an offence punishable for life, and another punishable by imprisonment for twenty years? I apprehend that the man who was sent to the State prison the other day, for twenty years, for the crime of murder, felt that he had gone for life.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURG—My friend from Berrien tells us that it is an institution that should not be struck out of existence. If we pass a law permitting the accused to appear before the body which we term a grand jury, by that very act we shall strike it out of existence. Where would the difference be between a so called grand jury and a traverse jury? You bring a man, try him, and again a second time try him by a traverse jury. If the legislature abolish this, they will do what at least I should wish them not to do, as I consider it venerable by its age and safe in its action; that they would destroy one of our firmest bulwarks when they abolish the grand jury.

Mr. WHIPPLE merely wished the matter tested by experience.

Mr. BAGG—In giving my reasons in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from Berrien, I do not know that I shall be able to grasp the whole subject. I thought I was ultra, probably the most ultra member in this Convention; and I find that I am drawn by the force of circumstances into a conservative position. I have listened to the various debates for the last two or three days, and I do think that those who wish to abolish the grand jury system, have failed to show reasons for the act. For myself, I have a peculiar way of judging the truth of a principle that is under investigation, probably peculiar to myself.

Truth is said to be a unit, and always agrees with itself. Error never agrees with itself, nor does it agree with truth. One will tell you that he is opposed to a grand jury, and in favor of justices of the peace acting in that capacity; another wishes one grand juror chosen from each town in the county, and each ward in a city; another wants to make the prosecuting attorney, in company with the justices, a substitute; another, that three or four of the justices shall make the substitute. This shows that they do not agree. One says that he objects to the grand jury system because it is too secret; the very next tells us that it is not half secret enough—not half as much so as that of an office of a justice of the peace. But it is useless to follow them in their various arguments and windings, as they do not tend to any one point. The only conclusion that they appear to come to is, that they do not know what a grand jury is instituted for. Capital has likewise been endeavored to be made by coupling it with the nobility of Great Britain. I say, sir, if the nobility of Great Britain, or the grand jury of Great Britain have established better principles of justice than a democratic government has done, then I am in favor of that principle. Nothing can tarnish truth, from whatever source we receive it. We should not look at the principle with prejudice, nor should we give a spring to the prejudices of the people upon this question. The question before us is, whether we shall abandon the grand jury system, or with a less number preserve the system as a court of inquiry; and upon due inquiry, send a criminal to stand his trial before a traverse jury of his county; and I contend that it serves better the cause of morality, and has a greater tendency to check crime. I shall vote for it, because I have ever thought that twenty-three were too many, while twelve men, in my opinion, will be infinitely better than some one man elected in a corner of some of our cities or towns. Call them grand jury or what you will, they ought to be retained. Dollars and cents have but little to do with me in comparison, where crime on the one hand, and innocence on the other, are concerned. Some gentleman computed the expense at two or three cents a head; if it amounted to a dollar it would still be as nothing; would be considered as of little importance. In certain local situations more crime is committed than in others; owing to their locality. In Detroit, owing perhaps, partly to the facility of the escape of criminals into Canada, there is more crime committed than in all the rest of the State. Well, sir, if we take the district attorney system, he may be called to the extremity of the county; he must be omnipresent, for he may have to attend a case in Detroit and a case in Plymouth at the same time; fifteen or twenty cases may be going on at once. I do not believe in it, sir. I believe that we ought to recognize a grand jury in a distinct article. I do not believe that we can strike it out without endangering the constitution itself. The very worst system imaginable, would be the union of a justice of the peace, sworn to inquire into the body of a town, united with an itinerant, perambulating prosecuting attorney, sworn to examine into the body of a county. It is an innovation not called for by the people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—I am but a young member of this body, and this fact inclines me to silence; but when important questions are under discussion, I feel bound to give utterance to my sentiments. As far as the county of Saginaw is concerned, I have heard many say that the institution of the grand jury was a curse; but it does not become me to repeat the sentiment, in opposition to the able arguments I have just heard. But, from the little experience I have had, it does appear to me that the system involves a great deal of delay that is unnecessary in criminal proceedings. In criminal matters of which justices have jurisdiction, a party appears before the magistrate, and makes his complaint; the person complained of has an opportunity to make his defence; if he does not exculpate himself, judgment is given against him; but after this, the case has to be laid before a grand jury; a delay of months might occur. When the matter is first investigated, the whole aspect of the case is seen. The public are convinced that the person ought to be acquitted or not, and as a general thing, justice is done. When greater crimes are charged, why not have the prisoner brought up in a similar manner, and have him examined? In these cases, the services of the prosecuting attorney are always called in under the present system, and he has an opportunity of ascertaining whether there are any grounds for the charge; and having heard the evidence on both sides, he is prepared to draw up an indictment. Would not that be better than binding over the prisoner? Why not have an indictment immediately after the first examination, and have a traverse jury try the prisoner, instead of waiting until a grand jury bring in a bill? Would not both expense and time be saved by this method? Would not justice be as likely to be done to the parties? The examination before a grand jury is always ex parte; and where is the propriety of laying the matter before an ex parte tribunal, after there has been an examination of witnesses on both sides, in a preliminary proceeding. If the prosecuting attorney has found reason or probable cause to charge crime upon the prisoner, is not that sufficient to hold him to final trial, as soon as the parties get ready?

It has been said that the expenses of the grand jury amounted only to one cent to each citizen. If the cent had been spent in the manner proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph, it would have done the citizens more good.

Mr. WHIPPLE—Five cases of murder have been recently presented by grand juries.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—Three thousand eight hundred and seventy-one dollars have been spent by thirteen grand juries.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Twenty-two counties have been reported.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—I looked at the report with some care. Thirteen grand juries have set at an expense of $300 each. Might not that expense have been saved, and justice done to all parties?

Mr. McLEOD—As the gentleman from Berrien proposes to give his views more fully, I certainly hope that we shall have the benefit of them before finally settling the question. It certainly comes to us under imposing circumstances, presented by the Chief Justice of the State, and so ably seconded by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG,] who says that he represents more crime than any other member on this floor.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Having been absent for two or three days, I have heard but little of the discussion upon the subject under consideration, and never having had any intimation until within the last week that there existed any desire to abolish the grand jury system, I confess I am not prepared to give a satisfactory vote.

I believe that an attempt was made to engraft in the article a provision requiring in most cases a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and it failed. Had I been here when this proposition was made, I should have voted against it, because I prefer to submit the whole matter to the Legislature. I would not limit its action, and for the reason that it is, at least in this State, a new question, of magnitude and importance, which has not been agitated or discussed, and upon which the people have expressed no opinion. The abolishment of the system would be a great innovation, and might give rise to many and dangerous evils; but at first blush the reasons for its discontinuance have great weight, and many are led to doubt the propriety of continuing it. The novelty, however, of the experiment is too obvious not to deter us from making it a part of the fundamental law of the land. Are we able in so short a time as we can devote to its consideration to give it that attention which it deserves? It is an important change, and the attention of the people being now directed to it, if it meets their approval the Legislature will adopt their views and dispense with the system; and when it has been fully and fairly tested, if it meets the approbation of its advocates, the system will not be reinstated; but if, on the contrary, its abolition proves disastrous, it can and will be restored.

If I am informed correctly, the experiment has been tried in one of the States of the Union, and there it is said to operate satisfactorily. In Scotland, too, the grand jury system does not exist, and yet no inconvenience or evil is found to arise from its want. In England and most of the States, it is cœval with most of the valuable institutions of the country, and is deemed absolutely necessary in the prosecution and prevention of crime. Such being the case, it is not strange or remarkable that doubts should exist in the minds of members as to its propriety or impropriety.

I am not prepared to discuss the question on its merits, nor do I perceive any good that can at present result from it. The principle is new—it has not been acted upon by the people, and they have expressed no opinion upon it—and it would be improper and impolitic for us to engraft it upon the constitution without more consideration and regardless of their sanction. I would much rather the Convention would confine its action to those subjects which have called us together, and in regard to which we can have but little difficulty if we reflect the wishes of our constituents.

There are many features of the grand jury system which are objectionable, but we are not prepared to correct them, and had better leave it to the action of the Legislature. They can examine into the facts and give the subject due consideration, and change, modify or abolish it, as circumstances may require. It is, undoubtedly, susceptible of great improvement, and may, perhaps, be made less expensive and far more useful and serviceable than it is at present. No good reason can be assigned why a criminal, after a thorough examination before a magistrate, and a requirement to appear before the court and answer to the offence of which he is charged, should not be tried without the intervention of a grand jury. On the other hand it may be necessary to have this machinery to examine into criminal combinations and conspiracies; and to induce grand jurors, under the solemnities of the oaths they take, to disclose facts in regard to persons and offences committed in their neighborhood, that might lead to the conviction of offenders against the laws, and which otherwise would never become public or be made grounds of accusation.

But my object is not to discuss the question on its merits; I merely desire to impress upon the Convention the impropriety of our giving the proposition to abolish the system entirely, a favorable consideration. The Legislature can try experiment after experiment, and if evils result from its action it will not be of so permanent a character as if we adopt it as a part of the constitution of the State.

As there are, perhaps, few prepared to vote advisedly upon the question, I submit most respectfully whether it is not the part of wisdom to leave it entirely to the action of the Legislature.

On motion of Mr. RORERTSON, section 10 was amended by inserting in the second line, after the word "jury," the words "which may consist of less than twelve men in all courts not of record."

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, section 10 was amended by inserting after the preceding amendment, the words "to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation."

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to amend section 10, by inserting after the word "defence," in second line, the following, viz: "who shall have the right of reply."

Mr. CHURCH inquired whether the delegate from Eaton meant by the words "right of reply," the right to make the closing argument upon the trial—a privilege now accorded to the prosecution.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—Yes sir; we all know the old maxim, that "it is better that ten guilty shall escape than one innocent man shall suffer."

We all know that the best talent in the land is employed in the prosecution—that the utmost ingenuity is employed against them. The object of the amendment is to give him an opportunity for explanation, that he may have a chance for his life or his liberty. We all know that there have been cases where men have been convicted and executed, and afterwards it has been ascertained that they were innocent. It is right that crime should be properly prosecuted, and those who are criminals should be punished; but it is not a correct principle to consider a man guilty the moment he is accused. Every means should be given him to prove his innocence—to preserve his liberty or his life.

On motion of Mr. LEACH, the committee rose, and through their chairman reported the article back to the Convention with sundry amendments, in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked.

The committee of the whole were discharged from the further consideration of the same.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the article as amended was laid upon the table and ordered printed.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the committee of the whole were discharged from the further consideration of an amendment to the Bill of Rights, offered by him on the 10th inst., relative to persons engaged in duels, &c.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, The Convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, (13th day,) June 17.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MERRILL.

The President announced the following select committee on the petition of citizens of Pittsfield, Washtenaw county, for the incorporation of an article in the revised constitution prohibiting the legalization of the traffic in ardent spirits as a beverage: MESSRS. GARDINER, LEACH, AMMON BROWN, HATHAWAY and W. ADAMS.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. KINGSLEY: of 205 citizens of Washtenaw county, praying that the amended constitution may provide for extending the right of suffrage to colored people.

Referred to the committee on the elective franchise.

REPORTS.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the committee on the executive department, submitted the following:

ARTICLE —.

Executive Department.

1. The Executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall hold his office for two years. A Lieutenant Governor shall be chosen at the same time and for the same term.

2. No person shall be eligible to the office of Governor, or Lieutenant Governor, who shall not have been five years a citizen of the United States, and a resident of this State two years next preceding his election; nor shall any person be eligible to the office of Governor who shall not have attained the age of thirty years.

3. The Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be elected at the times and places of choosing members of the Legislature; the persons respectively having the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, shall be elected; but in case two or more shall have an equal and the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, the Legislature shall, by joint vote, choose one of the said persons so having an equal and the highest number of votes.

4. The Governor shall be Commander-in-Chief of the military and naval forces of this State.

5. He shall transact all necessary business with the officers of government, civil and military; and may require information, in writing, from the officers of the Executive department upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

6. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

7. He shall have power to convene the Legislature (or the Senate only) on extraordinary occasions. He shall communicate by message to the Legislature, at every session, the condition of the State, and recommend such matters to them as he shall deem expedient.

8. He may direct the Legislature to meet at some other place than the seat of government, if that shall become, after its adjournment, dangerous from a common enemy or a contagious disease.

9. The Governor shall have the power to grant reprieves, commutations and pardons after conviction, for all offences except treason and cases of impeachment, upon such conditions, and with such restrictions and limitations, as he may think proper, subject to such regulations as may be provided by law, relative to the manner of applying for pardons. Upon conviction for treason, he shall have power to suspend the execution of the sentence until the case shall be reported to the Legislature at its next meeting, when the Legislature shall either pardon, or commute the sentence, direct the execution of the sentence, or grant a further reprieve. He shall communicate to the Legislature at each session, each case of reprieve, commutation, or pardon granted; stating the name of the convict, the crime of which he was convicted, the sentence and its date, and the date of the reprieve, commutation or pardon.

10. In case of the impeachment of the Governor, his removal from office, death, inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, resignation, or absence from the State, the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the Lieutenant Governor, for the residue of the term, or until the disability shall cease. But when the Governor shall, with the consent of the Legislature, be out of the State in time of war, at the head of a military force thereof, he shall continue Commander-in-Chief of all the military force of the State.

11. If, during a vacancy of the office of Governor, the Lieutenant Governor shall be impeached, displaced, resign, die, or be incapable of performing the duties of his office, or be absent from the State, the President of the Senate shall act as Governor, until the vacancy be filled, or the disability shall cease.

12. The Lieutenant Governor shall, by virtue of his office, be President of the Senate; in committee of the whole, he may debate all questions; and when there is an equal division, he shall give the casting vote.

13. No member of Congress, nor any other person holding office under the United States, or this State, shall execute the office of Governor.

14. Whenever the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor becomes vacated, the person executing the duties of Governor for the time being shall give notice thereof; and the electors shall, on the Tuesday next succeeding the first Monday of November next, choose a person to fill such vacancy.

The Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate pro tempore, when performing the duties of Governor, shall receive the same compensation as is allowed to the Governor. When in the actual performance of his duties as President of the Senate, the Lieutenant Governor shall receive the same compensation as shall be allowed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The like compensation shall be allowed to the President of the Senate pro tempore, when in the actual discharge of the duties of President of the Senate.

16. The great seal of the State shall continue to be kept by the Secretary of State; and all official acts of the Governor, his approval of the laws excepted, shall be thereby authenticated.

Which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Mr. CRARY, from the committee on the judicial department, to whom was referred the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the judicial department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that the legislature, at its first session after the adoption of the constitution, shall appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to reduce to a written code, the whole body of the law of this State, or so much thereof as to them shall seem expedient;" reported the same back to the Convention, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and recommended its reference to the committee on the schedule.

The committee was discharged, and the resolution so referred.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. Green offered the following:

Resolved, That the chairman of the committee on education be instructed to address letters of inquiry to the present and late superintendents of public instruction of this State, soliciting their opinions as to the propriety of establishing the free school system, and particularly what, in their opinion, would be its effects upon general education in this State.

Which, on motion of Mr. DANFORTH, was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE, if in order, would call up the resolution he had previously offered for eliciting certain information from the Auditor General. He would state that he had seen the Auditor General, and had been informed by that officer that he could furnish part of the information sought; a part, it would take some length of time to furnish. He [Mr. W.] hoped the resolution would pass, that so much information as could be readily obtained might be had.

The resolution was taken up and adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN submitted the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, It is desirable that the business of this Convention should be completed at the earliest practicable period;

And whereas, the practice of distributing newspapers and other mail matter among members of the Convention, and the practice of reading newspapers and other mail matter by the members and others within the bar, during the hours of business, disturbs the harmony and impairs the efficiency of the Convention, retards the progress of public business, and should be prohibited by this Convention; therefore,

Resolved, That the following be adopted as one of the standing rules of this Convention:

"No newspaper or other mail matter shall be distributed among the members of this Convention, between the opening and the closing of its sessions; nor shall any member of this Convention or other person within the bar, read any newspaper or other matter, foreign to the business of the Convention, between the opening and the closing of its sessions."

Mr. WILLARD moved as an addition to the rule proposed, "unless when long and dull speeches are being made."

Pending which, the proposition of Mr. BRITAIN was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. McCLELLAND in the chair.

Article —, mode of amending and revising the constitution, was considered and laid aside without amendment.

Article —, division of the powers of government.

Sec. 2. No person or persons belonging to any one of these departments, nor either of the departments, shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except in cases expressly provided for in the constitution.

Mr. CORNELL moved to strike out the words, "nor either of the departments." He considered it an unnecessary repetition of the words next preceding.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the words would not be stricken out. The first clause referred to the individuals in a department; the latter to the department itself, without reference to one or more persons.

Mr. J. CLARK—The object in view was to make it as restrictive as possible. The language was incorporated with that express view. He hoped it would not be struck out.

Mr. ROBERTSON would suggest that the provision the gentleman proposes to strike out, is a provision of the old article, which says that one department shall not exercise the duties of any other department. The other clause applies to particular persons in those departments, and it is correct.

Mr. CORNELL withdrew the amendment, and the article was laid aside.

Article —, impeachments and removals from office.

Sec. 2. All impeachments shall be tried by the Senate, &c.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to amend by inserting after the word "Senate," the words "and judges of the supreme court."

Mr. BUSH hoped the gentleman would give some reason for the proposed amendment. In the absence of any argument, he was of opinion that the amendment would be improper. In cases of impeachment, the person removed would be liable to be indicted and tried, and come again before those judges. That no prejudice might be on the mind of the judge, it would be better to leave the section as reported by the committee—that impeachments shall be tried by the Senate.

Mr. SULLIVAN said the reason for inserting the amendment was that cases may arise in which the advice, argument and reasoning of the judges of the supreme court would be of use, especially in regard to rules of evidence and judicial proceedings. As individuals may be impeached for political offences, it is clearly proper that they should be tried by a tribunal composed in part of men having a large amount of political information. But then, in a case of that description, it is also to be considered that such a tribunal will act under the influence of strong bias and prejudice. It is important, therefore, to have a body associated with them, who are removed from the arena of politics, and who do not partake of that prejudice and excitement which influence a political body. A judicial officer may be impeached; and in that case it is peculiarly important that legal men should be associated with Senators, for questions might arise in regard to the construction of laws, the forms of judicial proceedings and the practice of courts, in which their opinions would be extremely important. Members of the Senate are elected without reference to their judicial qualifications, and it might happen to contain upon the trial of an impeachment but a small amount of judicial ability. He held that whenever an impeachment was tried, the person impeached should have the benefit of the ordinary rules of evidence, and that the practice of courts should be adhered to as far as practicable. It is, therefore, important that the tribunal for trying impeachments should be composed in part of men who are familiar with the rules of evidence and the practice of courts. In the State of New York, the Court of Appeals constitutes a part of the tribunal for the trial of impeachments. He believed great benefit would result from the adoption of a similar system here.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEACH moved to amend by striking out the following: "Before the trial of an impeachment, the members of the court shall take an oath or affirmation, truly and impartially to try and determine the charge in question according to the evidence."

Mr. L. made the motion because he wished to do away with an evil which existed and which was increasing.

There is, or at least should be, some solemnity attached to an oath; but by our laws, oaths are required to be taken on so many occasions, that no regard or attention is paid to them. If a citizen be elected to an office, however insignificant that office may be, the first thing he is required to do is to swear that he will perform the duties of the office according to the best of his ability; having performed the duty, he has to swear that it was well done. He [Mr. L.] was opposed to this great multiplicity of oaths; they ought to be done away with in numerous instances in which they are required to be taken.

There certainly was no necessity for its requirement in cases of impeachment, as far as Senators were concerned. Senators are sworn to do their duty to the best of their ability, and when acting on an impeachment, they would be acting under the obligation of that oath.

Mr. HANSCOM—There was a broad distinction between members of the Senate sitting as a high court of judicature, trying cases where the rights of the public were affected, and that class of oaths to which the gentleman from Genesee had alluded. In this case the Senate is reorganized and becomes a court to administer the laws of the land. It applies particularly to the case of an impeachment. If a case can be put, where an oath should be administered to a person having the administration of justice in his hand, it should be in cases of trials of impeachment.

Mr. LEACH must be permitted to say he did not see such a difference between Senators acting in their original capacity and their judicial capacity.

It appeared to him that there would be no more propriety in requiring Senators to renew their oath when required to act on cases of impeachment, than there would be in requiring the chief justice to take a new oath every case he tried.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. LOVELL moved to amend by striking out the word "present," and inserting the word "elect," in the clause which provides that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Mr. L. said he supposed a majority of the Senate would constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; if so, it appeared to him to be wrong to allow two-thirds of a quorum to convict in a case of impeachment. For the purpose of taking the sense of the committee on the subject, he proposed to amend.

The amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, section 5, first line, was amended by striking out "Executive," and inserting "Governor."

Section 6 provides that the Governor shall remove any judge on an address of two-thirds of the Legislature.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to strike out the section, for the reasons that, in the first place, it was entirely too indefinite; and, in the second place, he could think of no good reason why the Governor should be vested with the power.

An address of two-thirds of each House is required for the removal of an officer, while an impeachment may be found on a majority of one house. This shows an absurdity on its face. This provision can only apply to the judges of the Supreme Court. He [Mr. B.] entertained the opinion that the Governor ought not in any case to have power to remove a judge.

Mr. GOODWIN said proceedings by impeachment are proper and necessary in cases of corrupt conduct in office, crimes or misdemeanors; at the same time, there may be cases where such proceedings could not be had, in which it would be improper to continue an individual in office, —in case his mind should be impaired. There are many cases in which a judge might be unfit to execute the duties of his office, and unless this section were retained there would be no means for his removal.

Mr. WALKER moved to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may." As the Governor had to be addressed, it appeared proper that he should have some discretionary power on the subject.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. BUSH was opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. BARTOW.] It is not presumed that an impeachment would be proceeded with against any officer unless it be for corruption in his official capacity; but in this uncertain and changeable world, a person may be competent to-day to fill any office, and he may be totally incompetent to-morrow. He may be as honest a man as ever, still he may be totally incompetent to perform the duties of his office. This section is proposed to be incorporated in the constitution to meet this contingency—that when two-thirds of the members of the Legislature believe a person to be incompetent, but not corrupt, they may address the Governor and have him removed.

Mr. BARTOW withdrew his motion to strike out.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to insert "two-thirds of the members elect." There had been much discussion and heavy expense incurred in several legislatures, as to the meaning of two-thirds; whether two-thirds of all elected, or two-thirds of a quorum. He offered the amendment for the purpose of fixing a definite meaning to the words, and removing all difficulty with regard to the interpretation hereafter.

Mr. RAYNALE supposed the object of the section was merely to enable the Governor, during the sitting of the legislature, to get rid of a judge incapacitated for his office. It seemed to him to require two-thirds of the members elect of both houses to address the Governor in this case, was requiring too much. The matter will be left perfectly safe, in requiring the majority of the legislature to address for removal.

Mr. KINGSLEY thought it would be dangerous to leave the power of removal with a bare majority. In times of high party excitement, all the judges might be removed.

Mr. COOK was in favor of the amendment. Where the constitution requires any thing of the legislature, the language should be specific; so that no doubt could be ascertained as to the vote required. In our present constitution, where this language is used, it has given rise to much discussion, and much time has been spent in arriving at the conclusion as to what it meant; whether two-thirds of the members elect, or two-thirds in their seats.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out the word "address," and insert "concurrent resolution." This has been adopted in the constitutions recently revised. It has a definite meaning, and would apply to the action of a body in their legislative capacity.

Mr. BUSH was of opinion that cases might occur when it might be necessary for the legislature to exercise this power, when not in session. He knew a person in office who was struck by palsy, and his mental faculties impaired. In a case of that kind it might be very necessary that the Governor should exercise the power conferred upon him during the recess of the legislature. The power to do so, could do no harm; but cases might occur where it might be beneficial.

Mr. CRARY would ask if the gentleman supposes that, under the law as it now stands, two-thirds of each branch of the legislature may address the Governor to remove a judge, when not in session? When it speaks of two-thirds of each house, it means two-thirds in actual session. At the close of the session, the members are scattered through the State. Who is to state the case? To accomplish the object, the cause for removal should be stated at length. The gentleman is mistaken in his construction of the article. When assembled in their legislative capacity only can they address the Governor for the removal of a judge. It does not contemplate that members at home can sign an address. Mr. Morris, of New York, was removed by a vote of two-thirds of the legislature, but they were in actual session.

Mr. BUSH believed that, literally construed, the article in the constitution would give the Governor the power, and make it imperative on him to remove a judge on an address of two-thirds of the members, when not in session. He knew not what the decision of the courts might be, but such was his view of the question.

Mr. GOODWIN—A member of the legislature is only acting as such, when acting with his fellow-members in session. If he signs a paper at home, he signs it as an individual. He only acts as a member when in session.

Mr. HANSCOM would add, "when in session." The meaning was well understood, but it could do no harm to insert the words.

The amendment was adopted.

Sec. 7. The legislature shall provide by law for the removal of justices of the peace and other county, township and school district officers, in such manner and for such cause as to them shall seem proper.

Mr. LOVELL moved to strike out the words, "justices of the peace," and insert "all."

Mr. BARTOW would inquire to what class of officers a justice of the peace belonged. He is elected in the township, but he is a conservator of the public peace, and belongs to the county.

Mr. HANSCOM believed the section well enough as it stood. Justices of the peace were named specifically on account of the importance of the office.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to strike out the first clause of section 3, which provides that the House of Representatives shall elect from their own body, three members, whose duty it shall be to prosecute impeachments.

Mr. B. said this appeared to him to be a new feature in impeachments. It might induce members to promote impeachments for the purpose of obtaining the office, and thus result to the injury of individuals. Every thing of that kind ought to be avoided, if possible.

Mr. SULLIVAN said the reason for the clause which the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] proposed to strike out, was apparent. The legislature having adjourned, as prescribed in the next clause, it would be necessary that some person or persons should be appointed to present the facts to the Senate. It would be an anomaly indeed, to have a prosecution instituted against an individual, and have no person to conduct it. It has been the practice to appoint conductors of impeachments in each case. The committee were of opinion that this provision might with propriety be incorporated in the constitution.

Mr. BRITAIN—All the cases cited by the gentleman from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN,] and others who have spoken against the amendment, are cases which have occurred where impeachments were tried during the session of the legislature, and where an appointment upon a committee to prosecute impeachments, only increases the labor of the persons appointed, without increasing their compensation. What would be safe in that case, might become unsafe in this case, where impeachments are to be tried after the close of the session; and the members of the committee can extend their official term, with its pay, by investigating and promoting impeachments; and I think any man ought to be able to see in it an inducement to members of the committee, to get up impeachments upon frivolous pretences, merely for the purpose of prolonging the sessions of the Senate and committee, without the least expectation of sustaining them before the Senate.

If it is desirable to try the impeachment after the adjournment of the legislature, (as perhaps it may be to save expense,) I hope at least that the committee will not be appointed until after the impeachment shall have been ordered, and should be glad to see some plan devised, by which it could be dispensed with altogether.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out the words "elect from their own body three members," and insert "shall designate proper persons."

Mr. H. said he thought the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN,] must see the necessity of a person or persons being appointed to conduct an impeachment. The House, it is to be presumed, will be in possession of all the facts upon which the impeachment is founded. The Senate is constituted a tribunal for trial; the person accused can appear by counsel; it is essentially a trial at law. It would perhaps be better to leave it here, so that that body may appoint.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE was opposed to the proposed amendments. It was the duty of the House to conduct the impeachment, and prosecute it to a final decision. The whole responsibility rests with the House. He [Mr. P.] should be unwilling to insert any thing in the constitution that would lessen their responsibility.

Mr. SULLIVAN was of opinion that persons belonging to the House would be the most proper to conduct an impeachment, because the persons who bring forward the impeachment are those who have made it a matter of investigation. Those having a knowledge of the facts, always will be, and always ought to be appointed to conduct an impeachment; to appoint others, who are not required to have the requisite knowledge, seemed to be improper.

Though not believing in the perfectability of human nature, he could not think it so degenerate that three individuals, selected by one branch of the legislature, should labor to pursue an impeachment that would stamp ignominy on a person for life, for the advantage of being employed a week at three dollars a day. The danger apprehended by the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH,] he [Mr. S.] believed to be imaginary.

Mr. GOODWIN said it seemed to him to be peculiarly appropriate, in incorporating an article in the constitution on the legislative department, prescribing the mode in which they shall discharge their constitutional duties, to say when an impeachment is made by the House, they may appoint a committee to conduct it.

In the House, before an impeachment is ordered, it will be subject matter of inquiry by a committee, to ascertain the facts. When an impeachment is prosecuted, the committee to conduct the impeachment, usually, are those persons who have obtained the information and laid it before the House. They do it in the discharge of their public duty, in protecting the rights of the citizens of the State.

In view of the prosecution of the impeachment, they, of course, select those members who are best acquainted with facts, and most peculiarly fitted to present them to the tribunal appointed to try. There is a peculiar propriety in the provision as it stands in the section.

Mr. BRITAIN expressed himself not quite satisfied with the arguments in favor of this innovation, but would submit to the sense of the committee.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the committee rose, reported the articles back with amendments, and were discharged from their further consideration.

Article —, mode of amending and revising the constitution, being under consideration, the same,

On motion of Mr. BARTOW, was laid upon the table.

Article —, division of the powers of government, reported back without amendment, was ordered engrossed for a third reading.

The Convention having under consideration Article —, impeachments and removals from office, the amendments made in committee were concurred in in gross.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the article was further amended by inserting after the word "shall," in line 1 of section 3, the words "when an impeachment is directed."

Mr. ROBERTSON inquired whether there was any provision for the removal of any State officer, except by impeachment. The Treasurer might go on pocketing the funds during the recess—the Governor or any one else having no power to remove him.

Mr. SULLIVAN said the matter had been under consideration in committee. They thought it not proper to take action on it, but leave it to the Legislature. To go into the matter would require an amount of detail that would be better left to the Legislature.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend section 6, line 2, by striking out "shall," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "may."

Which did not prevail.

The article was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, Article 1, Bill of Rights, was taken from the table.

Amendment to section 6, to strike out the word "religious" and insert "political;" the question being on concurring,

Mr. BRITAIN said—Persons have religious rights as well as political rights, and he did not know why they should not be as sacredly protected. He was aware that the term religious was treated with a sneer when it was proposed to be struck out; but had not the people religious rights, and was it not proper that those rights should not be impaired on account of their opinions on religious subjects? Is there any preference in the other rights? Is there not as much propriety in protecting a man from persecution and intoleration in consequence of his opinions on matters of religion? It is important to protect him; we ought to insert "no man's civil, religious or political rights shall be impaired."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The object the gentleman from Berrien had in view was provided for in the article in respect to the competency of witnesses. The article under consideration had reference simply to civil and political rights, and not religious. Every man has the right, as far as religious matters are concerned, to maintain his own opinion. The word here would be unnecessary.

The amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, section 21 was further amended by striking out the word "foreigner," and inserting the word "alien."

Mr. C. said the word alien had a fixed and definite meaning, the other had not.

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to insert after the word "contract," in section 16, the words "or affecting the vested rights of private persons, or retrospective in its operation."

Mr. WHIPPLE, in offering the amendment, remarked that its object was to arrest a species of legislation which had affected, vitally, not only the rights of individuals, but which had, to a great extent, impaired the honor and credit of the State. The constitution of the United States contained a prohibition against State laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Under this provision it has been held that a law which affected vested rights was not within the inhibition unless the obligation of a contract was impaired. Vested rights were thus left to the mercy of State legislation, which knows no restraints except such as are imposed by the constitution of the United States or of this State. Why the constitutional restriction should have been limited to the protection of contracts and not of vested rights, it is difficult to imagine. While it is important that the integrity of contracts should be rescued from the grasp of unwise legislation, it is equally important that security should be thrown around vested rights.

The amendment further contemplates that all laws shall be prospective in their operation. He would not dwell upon the enormous evils which have followed in the train of this species of legislation, which it is the object of the amendment to suppress. Those evils are familiar to all who have kept pace with the legislation of this State since the organization of our State government. A glance at our statutes affords the best commentary upon laws which purport to extend relief to one class of citizens by defrauding another. The impolicy and injustice of such legislation was so manifest that he would forbear further comment. He desired that laws should hereafter be made to regulate the future conduct of those upon whom they are to operate, and not to act upon past transactions. I trust [said Mr. W.] that we shall give a death-blow to that brood of mis-called relief laws, which now disfigure our statute book.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Until recently I entertained the opinion expressed by my friend from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE;] but on further examination and reflection, I am inclined to doubt the propriety of adopting such provision as he proposes. The Supreme Court of the United States have decided that a law depriving an individual of vested rights was not unconstitutional, provided it did not impair the obligation of a contract. This decision gives to the Legislature of the United States and the States, where there is no prohibition, a great power, which might be abused; but from an examination of the cases that have come before our courts, I believe no evil has yet resulted from its exercise. It would be difficult to induce a legislative body to pass any such law, unless it appeared clearly that equity and good conscience imperatively demanded it. I would much rather clothe our courts with discretionary powers in reference to such cases as are usually presented for legislative interference, and should willingly go for any such provision, if it were properly guarded; but the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien is entirely too broad. Most of such laws have been enacted to cure defects in assessments and collection of taxes, and in the execution and acknowledgment of deeds. Many have doubted the expediency of the former, but few will object to the latter. There is almost an indispensable necessity in this State for the proper exercise of the power, because of the constant changes made in our general laws; and more particularly in those relative to the conveyance of real estate; some of which I will mention, for the sake of illustration.

The revised statutes of 1838 required deeds or conveyances for the purpose of being recorded, to be executed before one subscribing witness. These statutes were in force and took effect on the 31st of August of the same year. They were distributed over the whole State, and the people had scarcely become conversant with their provisions before they were amended. On the 30th of April, 1839, the legislature changed this feature of the law, and required two witnesses to the execution of deeds; and this change, by the provisions of the general law, began to operate one month after, and long before the statute making it was published or known to those to be affected by it. The same general statutes required the acknowledgment of the wife to be taken separately and apart from her husband, and that she should acknowledge that she executed the deed without any fear or compulsion of her husband. By an act passed April 1, 1846, the legislature altered this, and required that on a private examination, separate and apart from her husband, she should acknowledge that she executed the deed without fear or compulsion from any one; and this law, making such a radical innovation on the well established practice of all the States, took effect immediately after its passage. Now I will venture the assertion that there are many deeds executed and acknowledged after the passage and taking effect of these laws, conveying large and valuable tracts of land in this State, that are defective, although drafted by intelligent and competent draftsmen, and who are not censurable for their ignorance of the provisions of laws, whose existence, under ordinary circumstances, they could not have known. The defects, by the decisions of our courts, are material and important. By the improper action of the legislature, the title to much of our real property is, to say the least, involved in doubt and uncertainty. The parties acted honestly and in good faith, and the intention is plain and manifest, and can there be any valid objection to the interference of the legislature and the curing of these defects. The State has done gross injustice and should remedy the evil as soon as practicable, and I would interpose no bar to it. The legislatures of the different States have been accustomed thus to legislate, and if the facts upon which their action has been predicated are examined, I doubt whether any objection would be urged to it. A refusal to grant relief under the circumstances would be considered cruel and unjust. I hope, therefore, this amendment will not be adopted; at all events that its further consideration will not be pressed to-day.

Mr. WHIPPLE, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] observed, that he was unwilling to sacrifice a general principle, which finds its vindication in the breast of every honorable man, because in its application, particular instances of hardship may occur. The same course of reasoning would equally apply to every general law on your statute book; and yet, it furnishes no just ground for its repeal. The cases cited by the gentleman from Monroe illustrate my argument, and then, very conclusively, the injustice of retrospective laws. It is true, as was stated, that the legislature of a neighboring State, passed laws purporting to legalize the defective acknowledgment of deeds by married women, and it is urged that such laws are justified upon the soundest principles of morality. I will not stop, sir, to discuss the moral question, although I think it would not be difficult to overthrow the reasoning upon which it is based. The courts of the State of Ohio, yielding, perhaps, to the supposed hardship of the case, and the pressure of public opinion, upheld the laws in question. I think, however, I am justified in saying that these decisions were afterwards reconsidered, and the laws in question declared unconstitutional and void. The effect of such laws never fail to prove mischievous, and often oppressive.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the Article was made the special order for Thursday, and the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the Convention went into committee of the whole on the Article, Legislative Department, Mr. WELLS in the chair.

Sec. 2. The number of representatives shall never be less than sixty-four nor more than one hundred, and shall be chosen for two years and by single districts; the Senate shall consist of thirty-two members, and the Senators, two from each district, shall be elected for four years.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following amendment to section 2: Strike out all after "districts," in third line, and insert "the Senate shall consist of not less than twenty-four nor more than thirty-two members, and shall be elected for four years and by single districts."

Mr. RAYNALE moved to amend the amendment by striking out "four" and inserting "two."

Mr. FRALICK said he did not propose to make a speech, but would simply give his views on the question—views which he believed he entertained in common with a large share of his constituents—in fact, he considered himself virtually instructed to go for single Senatorial districts. The committee had reported differently, and he offered the amendment for the purpose of testing the views of the Convention on the subject. He thought thirty-two members of the Senate a large number; he should have preferred it limited to twenty-four, leaving it open to extension hereafter as the population of the country should increase. The reason why he proposed four years as the term for which the Senators should be elected was, that they might be elected alternately, so that in the first instance half the districts should elect for two years and half for four years, and afterwards alternately for the full term as they now do. He hoped this and some other amendments would be engrafted in the Constitution. The evils and difficulties that exist in large electoral districts were well known, arising from the irresponsibility of Senators to their constituents. He wished to bring Senators home, and make them more immediately responsible to their constituents. Under the present system a large portion of the people are entirely unacquainted with the character or abilities of the Senators they send here.

In my district [said Mr. F.] Senators are nominated without any knowledge by the people of the character, standing or ability of the candidates; to be sure, the convention says they are proper men; the party paper reiterates it—that of course—it is what it is paid for; but we want a different system. He trusted the convention would adopt the principle of single districts. Then every candidate would be known to a large portion of those who nominate and vote for him—they will then be acquainted with the character and abilities of those they send to the legislature to represent their interests.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The object the committee had in view in reporting this provision was to keep up the distinction between the Senate and the House. If the views of the gentleman from Wayne were adopted, he [Mr. McC.] saw but little necessity for a Senate, and it might as well be merged in the House, as had been proposed by one of the delegates. This had been tried in Vermont and Pennsylvania, and proved so unsatisfactory as to be speedily abandoned.

The design of a Senate is to act and operate as a check upon the House, and to preserve the conservative character of the Legislature. Hence the necessity of its members representing a larger territory and different constituents and interests from those of the House. Take, for example, the county of Wayne, represented in part by the gentleman who made this motion. You have adopted the single representative system, and according to the probable ratio under the next census, that county will be entitled to two Senators. It is true the boundaries of the representative districts will be more confined and less extensive—but when you take into consideration their associations, business transactions and political relations, it will be difficult to conceive how their interests, feelings or views can differ. The Representative, although elected by a portion of the county, will be practically the representative of the entire county as well as the Senator, and will be as zealous in maintaining its rights and interests. If any excitement prevails, the Senator will be operated upon by and partake of it, and its influence will be equally felt by both. Add to this the election of the Senator and Representative at the same time and for the same term, and you destroy another important feature of the Senate. That this will be done is likely, because it may be considered bad policy to elect the Senators for four years and classify them, inasmuch as then one half of the districts would elect Senators every two years.

The only material difference that will exist between the Senate and House will be the forms and proceedings upon bills and resolutions passing from one to the other. When the Representatives and Senators represented different territories, different constituencies and different interests, the measures proposed by one house were generally severely scrutinized by the other, and thus much hasty and immature legislation was prevented. But such will not be the case when their objects and aims are the same. The Senate, constituted as it usually is, is not so apt to yield to sudden impulse and passion; and its experience and knowledge of business and the principles of legislation fit it most admirably for the prevention of the evils that often result from the want of those qualities in the House.

Mr. Madison says, "A Senate, as a second branch of the legislative assembly, distinct from, and dividing the power with a first, must be in all cases a salutary check on the government. It doubles the security to the people, by requiring the concurrence of two distinct bodies in schemes of usurpation or perfidy, where the ambition or corruption of one would otherwise be sufficient. * * * * As the improbability of sinister combinations will be in proportion to the dissimilarity in the genius of the two bodies, it must be politic to distinguish them from each other by every circumstance which will consist with a due harmony in all proper measures, and with the genuine principles of republican government."

If you adopt the single senatorial district system, you will find great and perhaps insurmountable difficulty in preserving your counties entire and preventing divisions, and at the same time giving a full and fair representation. It would not only be bad policy, but few of the people would submit to a division of their counties and the attachment of a part to another county for the purpose of forming a senatorial district. If the gentleman's county [Wayne] has a large fraction, will its people be willing to detach a portion and suffer it to be united to another county? or will they be disposed to lose all representation for that fraction? Again, will the inhabitants of that portion willingly consent to sunder all the political ties and business associations which connect them with their own county, and be thus far separated from it? I doubt it. It will certainly introduce confusion and a state of things by no means desirable. If gentlemen would reflect upon the embarrassments surrounding this system, they would hesitate long before they would adopt it permanently.

The gentleman from Oakland proposes to reduce the Senatorial term from four to two years; and if the single district system prevails, it may be adopted. Your object should be to give experience to one or other of the houses, and the committee conceived that the term proposed in the article was not too long, and would have a salutary effect. If you examine into the causes of much of the legislation that has been complained of, it will be found to be the result of inexperience. Experience and practice are as necessary in this, as in any other profession or avocation of life; and it is usually a guaranty against unwise, improvident and extravagant legislation. Fraud and corruption may have been practiced, but it would at least be more charitable to ascribe it to this cause. You may send into the legislative halls the most talented and upright men in the community, and if they are not conversant with the business of legislation, they are liable to be imposed upon until they gain experience, which is often dearly bought by them and their constituents. Gentlemen may argue that the people can re-elect a member, and thus be benefitted by his knowledge; but rotation in office has become so popular, that even now it is exceedingly difficult to elect a member two years in succession; and it would be far more so if the two terms were four years. If you elect the Senators for four years, and divide them as proposed into two classes, and choose one-half every two years, you will always have a body of experienced men on whom to rely. If they are such men as should be there, the people need not apprehend any hasty or improper legislation; but if inexperienced men are sent, no matter how pure the motives by which they are governed, much bad legislation may be expected. You must guard against the "out-siders" and the tricks of legislation; and this requires much tact and an intimate knowledge of parliamentary proceedings.

He [Mr. McC.] was in favor of single representative districts, so as to bring that body as near as possible to the people, and to make it a fair exponent of their views and opinions. But the Senate ought to be differently constituted. There was no system superior to that under the constitution of the Union; of course, he did not contend for the same principle as to territory and population, but the Senate of this State should possess most of the characteristics of the Senate of the United States. There you find experienced men, practised in all the arts and forms of legislation, conversant with the history of the country, and knowing its wants. The House often throws into that body ill digested measures, but they seldom escape the ordeal to which all things are there subjected. Hence the reason of there being so little immature legislation in Congress. Try the single representative system, but carry it not into the Senate.

Mr. FRALICK—This section provides for two members in a district. By a clause in the fifth section, no county shall be divided in the formation of Senatorial districts; in which case a large portion of the county of Wayne will be disfranchised. With a Senate of thirty-two members, the county of Wayne will be entitled to three Senators. What shall we do with the excess over two? We cannot give them three, and a large number will be unrepresented.

Mr. McCLELLAND—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? At the first session of the legislature, the apportionment must be made. The construction heretofore put upon this clause by the legislature was, that they make the division as near as practicable, according to population. The ratio, if you base your calculation on the last census, will be about fifteen thousand; but some districts will have a smaller population than others. If the fraction be large, they will have a Senator; if small, they will not; if more than one-half of the ratio established, you will be entitled to a Senator; if less than one-half, you will not.

Mr. FRALICK—The matter is not yet clear to me. If a district were entitled to three Senators, they must either take four or two.

Mr. McCLELLAND—My view was, that we should give four Senators to a district. The committee reported two, and adopted the present ratio, founding it on the last census; under that enumeration the county of Wayne would be entitled to two Senators. As to the number of Senators, the committee thought it would be best to make it permanent, so as to dispense with further legislation upon it. The gentleman can easily obviate the difficulty he anticipates, by moving to amend the last line of the section by inserting the words "at least" before "two," so that the same will read, "at least two from each district."

It was [said Mr. McC.] the opinion of those experienced in legislation, with whom he had conversed, that the Senate ought to be increased; that it would be more efficient and do better service to the State, and that its respectability, dignity and usefulness to the people themselves would be greatly increased.

Mr. BRITAIN offered a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. FRALICK. Add to section two as follows: "and by double districts; Senators after the first election under this Constitution to be elected from each half of the district alternately."

He [Mr. B.] was aware that this would be received as a novel proposition; it had, nevertheless, not been offered without consideration.

The object of his amendment was, if possible, to meet the wishes of both those who desire single districts and those who wish to maintain the conservative character of the Senate. The last was by many deemed an important principle in the construction of an elective government, and one that ought not to be surrendered. Mr. B. did not know how this could be accomplished and elect by single districts, because all will be elected at the same time; and you will have a new House and a new Senate at the same time, unless you elect Senators for four years; and to secure experience to that body, elect one-half of them every two years, in which case the electors of but one-half of the Senatorial districts could vote at any Senatorial election. This would be an anomaly in the history of elective governments calculated to destroy the purity of elections by colonizing voters from one district into the other, and one to which he thought the people of Michigan would be unwilling to submit.

The objections to the election of more than one Senator from a district, were,

1. That it did not secure to the respective parts of the district a representation.

2. That it gave great inducements for the exercise of bad faith by one part of the district towards the other.

His amendment removed both of these objections. It removed the first objection by securing to each portion of the district its representation almost as effectually as single districts could do; and it removed the second objection by compelling both political parties to select their candidates from the same portion of the district.

Would he be told that the treachery of one part of the district toward the other was not to be expected, and need not be provided against? Persons who could think so had observed the operations of our political machinery to no purpose. He had never seen an election in a district furnishing two or more members without more or less of this bad faith, so generally denominated "bargain and sale;" and what was most mortifying to an upright man was that it was an exercise of treachery, which could not be punished, and one which was frequently rewarded. Did he say it could not be punished? The only way in which the treachery of one part of the district upon the other can be punished is by excelling it in treachery; and the system of electing two or more members from one district, without assigning to each portion of the district its member, is nothing less than placing before the electors of a district an inducement to exceed each other in treachery; and it is the moral duty of this Convention to remove, so far as practicable, all inducements for a practice so pernicious in its effects upon the tone of moral sentiment, and so destructive to that confidence between the different portions of a district so essential to its harmony and well-being.

He was aware that this would be considered a new proposition, and should not be disappointed if it should be rejected by the Convention; but our system of government was recently but an experiment, and the business of this Convention was to introduce reforms; and whether this Convention adopt this reform or not, he had no doubt it would be ultimately adopted into the elective system, or the election of two or more members from one district abandoned altogether.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out all after the word "members," in the amendment; which did not prevail.

Mr. CHAPEL moved to amend the section by inserting between "Senators" and "two," the words "at least;" which did not prevail.

The question recurring on Mr. FRANKLIN's amendment, it was negatived.

Mr. BUSH moved to amend by striking out in the third line the word "two," and inserting "one," and to strike out "four," in the fourth line, and insert "two."

Mr. MOORE moved to amend by striking out "two," in the third line, and inserting "three."

Mr. M. said he considered himself instructed on the subject, and submitted the amendment to the consideration of the committee in good faith. In the west the people were in favor of triennial sessions; they believed the State had been afflicted with so much legislation, that it might not be amiss to go into triennial sessions as a means of remedying the evil.

Mr. BUSH had hoped that some other gentleman, some delegate representing some other portion of the State, would have offered the amendment he proposed, but finding that would not be done, he felt it his duty, though fully aware of the strong expression in favor of biennial sessions, to rise in his place and give his views against the measure. During the course of his political life, he had advocated every principle, if he rightly understood it, that brought power nearer the people. He was one of the first members of the Michigan legislature that proposed the election of judges by the people. He had always, as a member of the legislature, advocated, as he hoped he always should, the rights of the people, and the immediate responsibility of all constituted authorities to the people.

But, sir, [said Mr. B.] what are we about to do? A report has been made unanimously by a large and respectable committee, shall I say to retrograde, or shall I use a milder term? In the exercise of an enlightened and progressive public opinion, the people have taken to themselves the power to elect their judges. That is in accordance with a movement to bring power nearer to the people that they may control it. But what is the character of the report of the committee? Is it in accordance with that movement in the public mind, that delegated power shall be under the control of the people, and be returned to their hands at short and stated periods—or is it to double the power in the hands of one department of the government, placing it beyond the reach and control of the people for a long period of time? And for what purpose—under what pretence is this new feature to be stamped on the fundamental law of the land? To save a few dollars and cents.

It is true that in the State of Michigan excessive legislation has been complained of, and the expense has been great. Men were sent to the legislature who were anxious to promote the public good, but some laws not wise have been enacted. One of the principal objects for which this Convention is assembled is to correct those evils—to lessen the expenses of legislation, and, if possible, to give more stability to our laws; but in attempting to accomplish those objects, let us not sacrifice the rights of the people and open wide the doors for fraud and speculation in another department. Look, sir, at the executive department of the United States. Have not all the abuses grown out of the executive department of the government? Have not great trusts been violated and the rights of the people jeopardized by the executive? Look at the history of our own State, and the archives of our own government—examine them carefully and you will find that all the abuses that have been practised on the State have grown out of the executive department, while you cannot put your finger upon the first abuse perpetrated by the legislature. What are we about to do by changing from annual to biennial sessions of the legislature? We are about to limit the action and lessen the efficiency of a department the least likely to abuse, and close from the public eye, seal up from all means of investigation for two years, the transactions of a department most likely to abuse their power, where frauds may be the most easily practised and which most requires the vigilance of the public eye upon it. This, sir, we are about to do. Let corrupt officials get into that department, under a corrupt or inefficient executive, who may perpetuate his power for two years more. Is there any power to check or even detect abuses in that department? Frauds may be committed in the treasury—it may be Galphinized, and all knowledge of the facts be kept from the public. There is no tangible way by which you can call the heads of departments to account, by which you can ferret out abuses and put the seal of condemnation on the perpetrators of fraud.

It is conceded by every one, that when power returns more frequently into the hands of the people, it is least liable to abuse. When gentlemen are thus about to exclude the people from all control over one of the most important departments of government for two years, I ask them to pause before they thus retrograde and take that power from the people given to them by the constitution. But, sir, is there no other way of effecting retrenchment, without affecting the rights of the people, and cutting them off from looking into the affairs of the government frequently? I believe there is, and will explain my views, by which I think it may be effected.

To-day I heard fall from the lips of a delegate that we have had the most rascally system of government—that we have had the most rascally legislation—enough to damn any State in the Union. But what are the facts? The State went into existence on a paper bubble, the wandering meteor of the times; in the first stages of our political existence we came under the influences of the greatest speculative mania that ever affected a people; we have gone through the ordeal of an expanded currency that perished on our hands, and have suffered from the collapse; yet, sir, with all these drawbacks, Michigan stands up in bold relief—she is not ashamed to compare notes with any of her sister States.

Was it to be expected that we should escape, inexperienced as we were, from those disorganizing influences? We have suffered from immature, hasty, and ever changing legislation; but the people have taken it into their own hands, and justice will be done. It is the cause and effect. So will it ever be when the people can look into the offices of the State, and can do so annually.

The State of Michigan has had long and expensive sessions of the Legislature, but the State has grown up rapidly. When the Convention met fifteen years ago, Michigan was but little known. There are more than twenty delegates on this floor from territory then totally unknown; and yet, we are only on the frontiers of civilization. Our destiny is not yet developed. Our government, in its first organization, had to attend to the wants of a new country, and every request, whether in regard to general or local interests, was presented to the Legislature—every local or township matter must go to the Legislature, and go through the paraphernalia of legislation. But sir, the experience of the country shows that power may be safely exercised by the people; and we propose to leave a larger share of power in their hands. We propose to give to the boards of supervisors all local legislation—it is in accordance with the spirit of the age—the country demands it—it brings the business of the people nearer to the people, they can check any thing wrong and nip it in the bud.

Carry out that principle, and you take from the Legislature four-fifths of the duties heretofore devolving upon it.

Have former legislatures violated their trust? Have they come here and idly spent their time? I appeal to the records of the State, and can say they have not wasted their time; but that during the sessions they were engaged fully in going on with the system of local legislation absolutely demanded by the people. It is now proposed to cut off local legislation, leaving it more immediately in the hands of the people. Take out of the hands of the legislature those township and county matters which can be better done by the boards of supervisors, and the session may be limited to a short period. I [said Mr. B.] will go for limiting the session to thirty days, and the per diem allowance to two dollars; but I will never record my name on the records of my country in favor of a measure, the operation of which will be to close the public eye on the executive department of the State. Make the sessions of the legislature as short as necessary—and long sessions will not be necessary, provided local legislation be taken from the legislature—but I want the legislature to assemble annually, to examine and deliberate on the affairs of the other departments of the State, so that fraud and corruption may be stayed and the public interest promoted.

Now, sir, before this step is taken, I ask gentlemen to provide some remedy. I ask them, before they remove this safeguard and protection to the public treasury, to make the Executive and State Officers amenable to some body of men, some committee, that can analyze the reports of the public officers, and examine the affairs themselves.

Power that is delegated for a long period is universally abused.

Look back, sir, to the history of the organization of the government of the United States, and the opinions entertained by many of the patriots of that day, relative to what they termed a strong government. They considered it dangerous to the stability of the government to leave power in the hands of the people. They thought it necessary that a President should be elected for life, and Senators for life. They established the practice of appointing judges for life. But who entertains those opinions now? They have vanished before the light of the present day; they have melted before the sun of truth.

Little did I expect, Mr. Chairman, to see those ideas again presented in the State of Michigan in the year 1850.

I hope the chairman who reported this provision will explain to us how we can get a peep into the departments, and call the officers of the State to account, more than once in two years. I am open to conviction; but when I know that a certain impetus has deranged public opinion—when I see my friends contemplate the perpetration of something wrong—if I believe myself right, I shall be ready to confront even the artillery of heaven in opposition to measures fraught with bad or dangerous consequences.

Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee, or any other gentleman, will explain to me how we can get at the information necessary to be had, and that it is proper to delegate power for so long a period as it is proposed to be delegated; if they will explain it satisfactorily, and if they can satisfy me it is just as safe, I am prepared to go for it. But for the purpose of saving a few dollars and cents, I will not violate a principle.

The question was taken on Mr. MOORE's amendment and lost.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. BUSH, it was taken and lost.

Mr. S. CLARK moved to strike out the word "two," in the fourth line, and insert "one."

Mr. C. was in favor of single senatorial districts. Without going into an argument at this time to sustain the views of his constituents, which he believed to be unanimous, he offered the amendment.

The amendment prevailed.

Mr. BAGG moved to strike out in third line "and by single districts."

Mr. B. said he had not intended to trouble the committee with any remarks of his; but when he saw the innovation about to be made, which he believed was not called for, and which he believed to be contrary to the spirit and genius of our institutions, and calculated to injure the masses, he could not let it pass without at least having the gentlemen bringing forward this proposition, give the reasons inducing them to make this innovation.

Sir, [said Mr. B.,] this whole nation is composed of parts—states, counties, townships, &c. Sir, the whole contains the parts, and the parts go to form the whole. This Union is one grand circumference with a centre in the affections of the people. The states of which it is composed, the counties and towns, are made up of other little centres. He had always supposed the great bond of union which held the nation together, not only as the whole, but relatively to the States, counties and towns, was the great law of association.

Sir, these little district systems, breaking us up, creating minute distinctions, is calculated to hurt the masses, to give the cent. per cent. men—the almighty dollar, if you please—which has ever been against the intellect, to give them undue power.

The gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] and my friend from Wayne, [Mr. FRALICK,] are agreed with regard to the district system for Representatives. My friend from Wayne is for dividing it "down—down—derry down." He is at least consistent. But while the gentleman from Monroe is for single districts with regard to the House, he is for double with regard to the Senate. I had supposed that this was an age of progressive democracy, with our steamboats and electric telegraphs—that we should not at least contract down our senatorial districts to an unit—that with all this intelligence we should have enlarged our senatorial districts, that each man might be acquainted with the whole Union.

The Congress of the United States has been sitting a long time in Washington to compromise a question that has broken up the laws of association, and almost broken the body politic into its original elements. Sir, the gentleman from Ingham has just told us that you are going to carry down to the people all local legislation, and give it to the supervisors. Such I believe is the spirit. Then is there any necessity for creating another little circle along side the supervisors? Look at it—what is the member of Assembly? In how many relations does he stand to the nation, the state and the county? Frequently he stands in particular relation to the Union, at other times to the state, and at other times to the county. Does not he in the legislature assist to make laws for the state and not for the county? Where did you ever hear a man swear to support a county, a town, a ward, a city or village? The wisdom that has gone before us made him take the oath to support the constitution of the United States and the constitution of this State. Sir, I am in favor of a large extension of our large circumferences corresponding with our large progressiveness. I am not for contracting down in this manner.

Again, sir, it is a sacred principle in our government, that majorities shall govern, unawed by dollars or any influences. Happily, the democracy of the State has been triumphant. It is the banner State, and every man has been proud of it. But divide up its people and where will be the predominancy of the masses. These local divisions will necessarily create laws to correspond with them. Laws should be simple and uniform, but they will create imperious distinctions adverse to the masses.

I have said the masses should govern. Here instead of having a general ticket for a county, does it not comport with the experience of members that you will have eighteen or twenty towns separated by different interests; some ten or fifteen of those towns affiliated together will destroy the union. How has it been when we have had three or four candidates up for the Presidency? How when we had three candidates for Governor? A nobody may come in and counteract the wishes of the people. Nothing can be calculated so disadvantageous to the masses as the district system.

I had not intended to say anything on this subject to day, but I could not let it pass without throwing out some views with regard to it. I consider it an innovation. I have not heard of a single petition being presented in favor of this single district system. Perhaps I may be told that my constituents want it; if so I should expect at least one petition in favor of the innovation. I shall perhaps be told that this innovation is necessary, from packed conventions. So far as Wayne was concerned, it was the district system that was complained of.

Mr. Bagg concluded by expressing his strong disapprobation of the district system. He would sooner vote on a general ticket, as being more in harmony with the sacred bond which unites the people as one nation.

Mr. COMSTOCK believed the prevailing opinion in the county he represented was in favor of single districts. The argument of the gentleman from Wayne had not convinced him. He was in favor of single districts both for Representatives and Senators, because it would bring power nearer the people.

Mr. FRALICK said the citizens of the State at large had so clearly expressed their opinions on this subject, that it was a question requiring but little discussion on that ground. If the opinions of his colleague had been published before the election, his constituents might have been enlightened. Perhaps if the gentleman had expressed his views before the election, he might not have had an opportunity of enlightening the Convention. The gentleman was mistaken when he said no petitions on the subject had been presented.

He [Mr. F.] had presented one in favor of single districts signed by four hundred and fifty persons.

Mr. BAGG said he had never made a secret of his opinions on the subject, but his associations were about the city of Detroit, the gentleman's [Mr. FRALICK's] about the town of Plymouth. The two atmospheres were different.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out "by single districts," and lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to amend section 3, by adding at the end, "each organized county shall be entitled to at least one representative."

Mr. McCLELLAND said the subject had been under the consideration of the committee, and it might appear strange that they had not adopted that clause in the old constitution. The reason was, they thought it would be improper and unjust to the rest of the State to have a representation neither based on population or taxation. That it would be improper if the basis was fixed on 5,000, to give a representative to 500 or 1,000, merely because the country was organized.

Mr. LOVELL was in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Saginaw. He could not be satisfied with less than the liberality of the old constitution. New counties will not go into organization until they have acquired a considerable amount of population; but they may before they have attained the requisite number fixed as the basis, and before five years shall expire. Those new counties are increasing in population most rapidly; under all the circumstances it would be proper to treat the new counties with liberality.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the amendment would not be adopted. A moment's reflection would convince any member that the most gross injustice would be done to the population of Michigan by the adoption of the amendment. It is not geographical territory we seek to have represented, but individuals—numbers.

From what information he could get, with regard to the population of the counties recently organized, a ratio may be fixed, by which one-fourth of the population would have at least one-half of the representation. Such a proposition as this must be unjust; it would practically disfranchise the more populous counties. In the Lake Superior region there are four counties organized; only one or two of those counties were populated, and those with only one or two hundred inhabitants. So in the upper peninsula.

The report of the committee was more just. The enumeration will be had every five years, and a new apportionment made. It would not be likely that in that time any large portion of the people would remain unrepresented.

Mr. McCLELLAND would suggest to the gentleman, to add to his amendment, "provided the population exceeds half the ratio established by law."

Mr. SUTHERLAND—The proposition is not to do injustice to the old counties, but justice to the new. He believed there was so much justice in it as to commend itself to the Convention. The question was one affecting his constituents more than any other that could come before the Convention. They are increasing in population every year, and when organized they require to be heard in the halls of legislation; and their population increases so fast that they will soon come up to the ratio of the apportionment. There are some counties having a population a little under the ratio, that may be cut off. There are some having a smaller population, which are filling up with emigrants, and which ought to be represented. Are they not entitled to be heard as well as other counties? Allow other counties to have a greater number of representatives, but do not silence their voice. Do not entirely exclude them; let them have one representative. If the ratio be fixed so as not to give the old counties a sufficient number, increase that number. Allow the new counties one vote—one member—and the others a multitude.

Mr. CHAPEL offered the following as a substitute: "Every organized county containing 2,000 white inhabitants, shall be entitled to one representative."

Mr. J. CLARK—This is an appeal from the new counties commending itself to the good sense of this Convention, especially as it regards the lower counties. It must be admitted that the old counties are fully and ably represented. That their interests must from necessity be well taken care of and provided for. They are surrounded by all the means of obtaining information; while the inhabitants of the new counties are shut up by bad roads and the want of facilities, and almost excluded from every means of information. If they are not allowed some individual to represent them, how are they to have their wants made known. It may be said they may be joined to other counties; but where that has been the case it has resulted in no advantage. The counties which have the largest population will retain the power, and will have their own representative. He believed Ionia, and some other counties, though attached to others for representative purposes, had never had a voice in the legislature. If those facilities which other counties have obtained were granted to our new counties, they would sooner be filled up. The reason why they have not settled so soon, has been for want of legislation. They had no voice, no one to represent or advocate their interests.

The public money has been disposed of to the old counties while the new counties have been entirely disregarded. They received no part of the appropriations made for roads or other public improvements. If they had been represented in the legislature, they might have received some attention. Representatives from those counties would be able to give information relative to their resources, and direct emigration to them.

He [Mr. C.] had been over our northern and western counties, and he knew the land to be naturally as fertile and as capable of cultivation as our more southern counties; there is not, perhaps, a better portion of country for emigrants to settle in. It is especially adapted to those coming from the north of Europe and our northern States.

In the first Convention, this appeal was made to the sense and liberality of the Convention. They very readily extended to new counties the privilege of being represented in our legislature. The county of Chippewa did not at that time contain three hundred persons. Perhaps to the introduction of a member from that county and to one from Mackinaw into our legislature, we owe the discovery of those minerals which add so much to the wealth of the State. They brought to the legislature that knowledge which led to the enterprise which is likely to be productive of great wealth to the country.

Mr. C. concluded by expressing his hope that representation might be extended to those counties; that their voice might be heard. It would be beneficial to those counties and could do no injury to the other more populous portions of the State.

Before the question was taken, the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. LEACH,

Resolved, That the State Printer be instructed to forward by mail one copy of the debates in the Convention to each newspaper in this State.

On motion of Mr. COOK,

Resolved, That there be allowed to the Secretaries of this Convention three dollars per day each, to the Sergeant-at-Arms and Door Keeper three dollars per day each, to the Messengers one dollar per day each.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of the article on the Legislative Department, Mr. WELLS in the Chair.

Section 3 being under consideration, and the question being on Mr. CHAPEL's substitute for Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment,

Mr. McCLELLAND said he would now answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. S. CLARK,] in regard to the organization and population of the new counties, made on yesterday.

In respect to the new counties, he took it for granted that those now organized would come in and be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the older counties.

The language in regard to the county of Sanilac was, "that the county of Sanilac, including the territory annexed thereto in the preceding section of this act, shall become duly organized, and the inhabitants thereof entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities, to which by law the inhabitants of other counties of this state are entitled, from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine." From that date it was an organized county.

Marquette, Houghton, Ontonagon and Schoolcraft were organized by the same act, the title of which was, "an act to organize four counties in the Upper Peninsula, and define the boundaries of the same." Approved April 3, 1848.

In regard to the population, Mr. McC. said he had no means of arriving at a near approximation, as some of them had held no election, and there were no returns in the office of the Secretary of State, except where they were attached to other counties. In the county of Chippewa, in 1849, the number of votes given for governor and other officers, was ninety-eight. Allowing ten inhabitants to each voter—and this he considered rather an over estimate—it would give to Chippewa a population of nine hundred and eighty.

In Clinton, the number of votes polled was five hundred and forty-eight. By the same estimate, this gave a population of five thousand four hundred and eighty. In Mackinaw the number of votes was two hundred and seventeen—this gave a population of twenty-one hundred and seventy. In Ottawa the number of votes was three hundred and thirty-eight—this gave a population of thirty-three hundred and eighty. In Saginaw, three hundred and fifty-one—this gave thirty-five hundred and ten inhabitants. In Houghton, at the recent election, the number of votes was one hundred and twenty-four, and that included the counties of Marquette, Ontonagon and Schoolcraft—which gave a population of twelve hundred and forty.

From Gratiot, Tuscola, Newaygo, Midland and Sanilac, he had no information on which to base a calculation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he did not desire to trouble the committee with many remarks, but the importance of the subject to his constituents induced him to offer an expression of his views, founded in part upon facts, which all might read and ascertain to be correct.

It seems fair [said Mr. S.] that the northern counties should have a representation commensurate with the amount of taxes they pay, as compared with those paid by counties where greater population entitles them to a plurality of representatives. The population of these new counties should not be taken into account as the sole ground of representation in adopting a permanent rule, as in the constitution of the State. If there is a liberal feeling pervading this body, and a disposition to extend to northern enterprise and improvement every encouragement not incompatible with the rights of other portions of the State, I am persuaded there will be reason for making an exception in their favor. Allow me to read to this committee a statement of the total valuation of real and personal property, returned in 1849, to the office of the Auditor General, from several of the older counties, which I have selected in every quarter of settled Michigan, for the purpose of exhibiting as far as possible an average of the amount of property to each delegate.

Counties.	Valuation.	Del.	Am't. to Del.
Calhoun,	$1,435,613	5	$287,123 60
Kalamazoo,	812,850	3	270,950 00
Oakland,	2,276,265	9	252,919 00
Genesee,	744,577	3	238,192 00
Eaton,	399,179	2	195,598 23
Livingston,	690,745	4	172,686 00
Saginaw,	344,919	1	34,919 00

These returns are made to the State office by officers in the respective counties, and they constitute the basis on which the State tax is apportioned. It will therefore be discovered that Saginaw county will pay considerably more than her proportion of the expense of this Convention, according to her representation. Comparing the statement of taxable property returned from Saginaw county with that returned from Livingston county, we see an unjust disparity between the representation apportioned to the two. Saginaw pays half as much of the taxes, with only one-quarter of the representation given to Livingston. Is this fair? Is it just and equal, aside from any considerations of liberality towards this younger county? It cannot be said that Saginaw has been selected for the purpose of exhibiting a stronger contrast. Ottawa might be cited with greater advantage, because this county has the same representation, and the amount of property returned exceeds that from Saginaw by many thousands of dollars.

Will it be said that representation should not be apportioned according to property? The claim upon this basis is not new; it is one of the political axioms of the American people, that representation and taxation go together. It has been fought for, established and sanctified by the patriots through whose sacrifices of blood and treasure we now enjoy the precious birthright of civil liberty. There is another consideration entitled to great weight in deciding the question now before the Committee. The northern counties are rapidly increasing in population—not barely keeping pace with the other counties further south, in more favored portions of the Peninsula—but their population is increasing with unparalleled rapidity. The only means of exhibiting the proof of this fact is, by referring to the vote given in the several counties during the last two years. The following is a table prepared from returns in the office of the Secretary of State, showing the electoral vote given in 1848, and the vote for Senators in 1849:

	Elec. vote in 1848.	Sen. vote in 1849.
Macomb county,	2398	1929
Kalamazoo,	2386	1788
Oakland,	5417	4517
Berrien,	2208	1533
Lenawee,	4853	3790

	Elec. vote in 1848.	Sen. vote in 1849.
Branch,	2149	1793
St. Clair,	1481	1533

The election in 1848 was more important, and called forth a larger vote than in the following year, where the population was the same. Allowing that there was the same interest in the election in one county as in another, there must be some reason in the supposition that in Saginaw and St. Clair there has been a rapid increase of population. There has, without doubt, been an increase in all of the counties, but not sufficient to prevent the election returns presenting a decrease in the number of voters. Why should the rule be reversed in the northern counties only, especially as in these new counties there are more obstacles in the way of attendance at the polls. The full extent of the increase in Saginaw is not to be seen from election returns, the greater part of the immigrants being foreigners. There has been an accession to the number of inhabitants in that county, within the last two years, of nearly one thousand Germans. Then, taking it for granted that there was in 1849 eight inhabitants to every voter, as is doubtless the fact, in Saginaw county there would then be only 2,952. But, small as this number appears, there must have been a prodigious increase from 1845 when the census was taken, as at that time there were only 1,218 inhabitants.

These foreigners are a deserving class of men—they have an honest purpose in locating in the retired portions of the county. They are quiet, industrious and persevering adventurers. They go into the forest where Yankee enterprise has never made its way—they go where no roads have been opened, settle down, and soon, as if by magic, the forest is removed and small farms, under excellent cultivation, teem with abundant crops. They bring, as a general thing, a fair supply of money, of hard currency, which they have used there, and to good advantage, until it has passed into a proverb that "there is money at Saginaw." These men are willing to pay taxes, and it is fair that they should be represented.

Some are opposed to the amendment under consideration, because it is alleged that in paying mileage from the Upper Peninsula, great injustice is done to the older and more populous parts of the State. The soundness of this argument does not very clearly appear, when we consider the disparity that now exists in the ratio of taxation and representation. Mr. S. said he appeared not as the advocate of the Upper Peninsula particularly. That section is now ably represented on this floor, although the delegates are not to-day in their places. It may be thought best to combine in one district the four counties near Lake Superior for representative purposes. There are only five newly organized counties in the Lower Peninsula, and none of them, so far as he had been informed, have as yet perfected a county organization by the election of county officers. The increase of population is so great that there would not be more than one instance at a time, of a county sending a representative without that number of inhabitants, that under the next apportionment would entitle them to at least one member of the legislature. The expense, too, of organizing a county and sustaining it, and erecting county buildings, will be a sure guarantee against any abuse of the constitutional right, for it can hardly be conceived that a small number of tax-payers would be so forgetful of their real interests as to incur so much expense for the sole purpose of sending one representative.

If, as has been proposed, the new counties are allowed a representation only when they have half of the number of inhabitants required under the apportionment, where is the liberality? Every county in the State gets an additional representative in all such cases. Is there in such a provision anything that deserves to be called liberal? It is hoped that something that is liberal, in the true sense of the word, will be agreed to.

Mr. J. BARTOW said, while a difference of opinion might exist among members in regard to the rule of representation to be established for the new counties, he could not believe that any wish, or desire, to deprive them of an equal and fair number of Representatives, was felt by any member of the Convention.

A different rule from that applied to the old counties should be made with respect to the new. They were situated differently; comparatively cut off, and not surrounded by contiguous territory having every interest well represented in the Legislature. Every one [said Mr. B.] must see the importance of giving a fair and just representation to the Upper Peninsula; the great mineral wealth and other extended interests of which were just beginning to attract the attention due them. It would be extremely harsh and unjust to say the counties north of Chippewa should not be represented because their population was a little below the ratio established for the older counties.

There was another consideration which ought to be taken in view. If biennial sessions of the Legislature were decided on, some of the new counties now having a population below the ratio fixed, would exceed it in a year or two, and yet could not be represented until the next apportionment—1855.

A large quantity of the produce of the surrounding country found an avenue to market through Saginaw, and the interests of those producers depended much on the disposition and welfare of that county. Mr. B. hoped such a rate would not be established as to deprive Saginaw county of a Representative. He believed the system of representation now existing to be fair, and such as would be satisfactory to the new counties for the next five years. Admitting the number of inhabitants to be small, there were other considerations which, he considered, should entitle them to a Representative. They were increasing rapidly in wealth and population, by which all portions of the State were greatly benefitted, and a clear gain added to the general wealth of Michigan.

If it were actually necessary to curtail the number of Representatives, it would be better to cut down the old counties than to deprive the new of representation. He held it to be more important that Saginaw should have one Representative than Wayne ten; and he believed the old counties, if required, would be willing to give up one Representative rather than have Saginaw, and other new counties, unrepresented. Yet this was not required—it was only necessary to continue the present system.

The amount of taxes paid by some of the new counties required they should be represented; and he hoped while this Convention had the power, it would not be disposed to deprive them of rights and privileges now enjoyed.

Mr. HANSCOM said, as the Convention was not full, and the subject of importance to several members absent who would probably give much information in regard to it, he would suggest the propriety of passing by the section.

Mr. WHITE hoped the suggestion would be carried out. He moved to pass over section 3. Carried.

Section 4 being under consideration,

Mr. WOODMAN moved to amend by striking out all in the first line to the word "in," and inserting "The boards of supervisors."

Mr. GOODWIN said the amendment, if adopted, might lead to some difficulty in the county of Wayne, as there was no board of supervisors in that county; there was a board of auditors.

Mr. DESNOYERS begged leave to correct his colleague, [Mr. GOODWIN.] There was a board of supervisors in Wayne.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. COMSTOCK moved to amend by striking out the word "white," in line 3.

Mr. SULLIVAN said he saw no reason why the word was inserted, unless the committee went on the ground that representation should be based on the number of electors. This he did not consider the true basis of representation. If the black population were not to be included, on what principle were minors, aliens and women to be taken in the enumeration? The blacks were citizens and had certain rights, and if they became paupers, the county had to support them. He believed they should be included in enumerating the population for a representative basis.

Mr. COMSTOCK said he could not perceive any reason why the colored population should be excluded in apportioning the representative districts; on the contrary, he believed it no more than right that they should be taken into consideration. There were none so ultra, even at the south, as to wish or desire to exclude them in taking the enumeration for a basis of representation; and was Michigan prepared to take that step and exclude them? He thought the proposition an extraordinary one.

Mr. HANSCOM remarked, as his friend,

Gen. ROBERTS, who was not in his seat to-day, being absent on leave, had a particular interest in the question—bands of Indians forming a numerous class of his constituency—he would suggest to the mover the propriety of waiving the consideration of the question to-day.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said, as several members were absent who were particularly interested, he moved to pass the section over.

Mr. LEACH thought they were particularly unfortunate. It seemed that members specially interested were always absent when any question came up. He saw no reason why the section should be passed over.

Mr. REDFIELD hoped it would not be passed over. If passed with the expectation of having a full house, it would not be acted upon for some time, as several members would be absent at all times. It would protract business to go on in this manner. Members should be in their seats.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said we were bound to believe that some necessity detained gentlemen from their seats, and in such cases should do as we would wish to be done by. Had he any particular interest in any question that should come up during a temporary absence, he would deem it an act of courtesy to have it passed over until his return.

Mr. BRITAIN—We are not bound to believe anything that does not appear reasonable and probable on its face. Leave of absence was granted the gentlemen, and the time for which it was granted has expired.

Mr. CORNELL had only one word to say. The amendment involved a general principle—whether apportionment shall be based on white population alone, or not. There was nothing sectional in it, and it could be as well settled now as at any time hereafter.

A motion was made that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. McCLELLAND said such a course of proceeding could but prolong the session two or three weeks. The section could be passed on in committee and when taken up in Convention gentlemen now absent would have an opportunity of expressing their views and proposing any amendments they thought proper. He was disposed to give them every opportunity to do so. But the plan of taking up an article and passing over a section, and then taking up another section and passing it over, must lead to difficulties in their proceedings.

Mr. BRITAIN thought the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] had correctly stated—that by thus passing over sections the session would be prolonged and difficulties ensue.

It was true that leave of absence had been granted to the gentlemen absent, as an act of courtesy, but he had not heard that leave was given on the ground of important business, and the time had already expired. The gentlemen from Cass, who were interested as much or more than any other members, had not asked the committee to postpone its action. As to the statement that the gentlemen from Mackinaw and Chippewa were detained from their seats from necessity, and we were bound so to believe, he would say again we were not bound to believe any thing that was unreasonable and improbable.

The motion that the committee rise was withdrawn.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I feel bound, Mr. President, to say a word in self-defence. In the absence of all testimony to the contrary, sir, we are bound to believe that the gentlemen from Mackinaw and Chippewa are necessarily absent; and the fact that the time has expired for which they were excused, is additional evidence they are providentially detained.

Mr. WILLIAMS, (in his seat,)—Rather improvidentially.

The question recurring on Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH's motion to pass over section 4,

Mr. CRARY said the section could not be passed over unless by unanimous consent. The proper mode of proceeding was to take up section after section, and pass them; that was the rule. The committee could not pass over a section unless by unanimous consent, and he objected. It was the business of members who had any particular interest at stake to be in their seats.

Mr. EATON thought the committee had a right to pass by or over any particular section they saw proper. After passing they could go back and take it up again.

Mr. E. read the 29th rule of the Convention to sustain his position.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The difficulty is this: the question is, is not the whole article postponed by passing over any section?

Mr. HANSCOM—Notwithstanding such may be the practice in other deliberative bodies, it has been the settled practice in the Legislature of this State, in committee of the whole, to pass by any section of a bill under consideration when any necessity calls for such action. There is reason in the rule, as we have just seen, when applied to section 3, which was passed by. Many members did not, at the moment, have sufficient information to enable them to vote understandingly, and to give an opportunity of preparing themselves to vote with as much light as possible, the section was passed by. All must see, sir, the obvious propriety in thus proceeding. By passing over any particular section the whole article is not postponed; only the section for the time, and the committee can go back and take it up again.

I hope, sir, the section under consideration may be passed over, as I am not prepared to vote on it at present, and do not wish to give a vote that I may hereafter regret. This, and the section just passed over, are so connected that we cannot act on the one under consideration without having matured that preceding it. For this reason it should be passed over.

Mr. EATON—The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] and the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] I acknowledge, have had much legislative experience, and they contend the whole article must be considered—that if a section is passed over the whole article is postponed. Now, sir, the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] desires to have this portion passed over until the delegates from Mackinaw and Chippewa are in their seats, and can give us their views on this subject. I do not see any objection to passing it by, or that such a course would conflict with the rules of the Convention. I hope the section may be passed over.

Mr. CRARY—Let us see what the English language is. I read from Jefferson's Manual:—"The natural order in considering and amending any paper is to begin at the beginning and proceed through it by paragraphs; and this order is so strictly adhered to in Parliament that when a latter part has been amended, you cannot recur back and make any alteration in a former part." We are now, sir, in committee of the whole on a particular order, the article Legislative Department, and we can take up nothing but this order. The order is the whole bill, and the committee must proceed to consider it by paragraphs or sections, or rise. We cannot pass over a section. The question is not whether we shall pass this section or that, but the whole article. The rule as laid down in the manual is the true rule to govern us.

Mr. S. CLARK—I understand the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] to raise a point of order—that the committee cannot pass over a section unless by the unanimous consent of the Convention. Now, sir, if such be the case, I am in favor of resuming the section already passed over. I hope the motion will not prevail, and that no section will be passed over for the accommodation of absent gentlemen.

Mr. HANSCOM said if the chair decided the rule to be as stated by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] he hoped an appeal would be taken. It would be well to have the question settled.

After some few remarks by several members, the CHAIR having decided the motion to pass over section 4 to be in order, the motion was put and lost.

The question being on the motion of the delegate from Lenawee, [Mr. COMSTOCK,] to strike out the word "white" in line eight,

Mr. McCLELLAND said, the gentleman from Lenawee is mistaken in supposing the insertion of the word "white," a new feature, or an extraordinary proposition. If he will turn to the article in the present constitution, he will find it reads as follows: "The legislature shall provide by law for an enumeration of the inhabitants of this State in the years one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and every ten years after the said last mentioned time; and at their first session after each enumeration so made as aforesaid, and also after each enumeration made by the authority of the United States, the legislature shall apportion anew the Representatives and Senators among the several counties and districts, according to the number of white inhabitants."

It has always been the rule in this State to make an apportionment on the basis of white inhabitants; and far from being an extraordinary rule, is a very ordinary one. The question was not raised in committee.

The provision in the Constitution of Illinois, after reciting the years in which an enumeration of the inhabitants shall be made, to form a new apportionment, reads: "and the number of Senators and Representatives shall, at the first regular session holden after the returns herein provided for are made, be apportioned among the several counties or districts to be established by law, according to the number of white inhabitants." In the State of Iowa the language of the Constitution is, "within one year after the ratification of this Constitution, and within every subsequent term of two years, for the term of eight years, an enumeration of all the white inhabitants of this State shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law. The number of Senators and Representatives shall, at their first regular session of the General Assembly after such enumeration, be fixed by law, and apportioned among the several counties according to the number of white inhabitants in each."

I believe, sir, this is a general provision in most of the constitutions of the different States. It is now for the Convention to say whether it shall be stricken out in our constitution. I shall vote against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS—It appears to me we are involving ourselves in a gross inconsistency by introducing the word "white" in this connection. The third section of the article under consideration contemplates an apportionment of our Senators and Representatives alternately every five years, on the basis of the census of the United States and our own State census. Now let us turn to the constitution of the United States, and what is its language? "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." Thus the constitution, even in the slave States, makes the number of souls, and not color, the basis of representation.

Mr. McCLELLAND asked the gentleman if he would adopt the whole of the constitution of the United States on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS—In what respect? The three-fifths feature in representation?

Mr. McCLELLAND—Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Oh no. I would not. That part is not applicable to us. I would preserve some show of consistency. We are compelled to adopt the enumeration of the United States census in the apportionment of members of Congress for this State. While we are represented in Congress on one basis, why adopt a different one in regard to domestic policy? Why not adopt the enumeration of the United States, and not garble it?

Mr. McCLELLAND—It would not be garbling it. The census of the United States is arranged in columns, and the number of white inhabitants is exhibited separately.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Still you are compelled to take the whole enumeration as the measure of your representation in Congress, and then you propose to garble and to carve it up, before you make it a basis of home representation. Let us be consistent.

But, I am a little too fast. In courtesy to the gentlemen from Mackinaw and Chippewa, [Messrs. McLEOD and ROBERTS,] we have passed over section 3, and are debating now the propriety of striking out a word in section 4, which occurs in the former section. I was opposed to passing section 3. Courtesy to the gentlemen named does not require it. We are only in committee. When the article comes in to the Convention, those gentlemen will have ample opportunity to take care of their interests.

In regard to the claim made by the delegate from Oakland [Mr. HANSOOM] in behalf of those gentlemen, on account of the large number of Indians in their districts, the United States enumeration settles that question also. "Excluding Indians not taxed," fixes the basis in that respect, and defines precisely who must there constitute it. Now, inasmuch as we are in a snarl in consequence of passing over a feature of section 3, and are considering the same feature of section 4, I would ask the gentleman from Lenawee to withdraw the amendment, and I will then move to resume the consideration of the previous section, and thence have plain sailing. But, inasmuch as I do not wish to trouble the committee again, I will say I am in favor of striking out the word "white," in both connections. 1st: because we shall preserve consistency by adopting the same basis of representation for our own legislature, which is adopted by the United States in our national councils; 2d. because of the absolute justice of the case.

I wish to say little in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Cass [Mr. SULLIVAN] on that point. One consideration, however, was omitted by him: "Taxation and representation should go together," says the gentleman from Saginaw, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] and in claiming for the sparsely settled counties a representation disproportioned to the number of inhabitants, he adduced tabular statements to show that their property was large, and the consequent interests to be protected, heavy, and therefore it should be estimated as an element in appointing representatives. The reasoning received respectful attention, and I think I saw evidences that the Convention were about to recognize it as sound, in conceding to the claims of the smaller counties. To this policy I do not here object; but I do insist that if the productive energies of Saginaw, existing in its property—saw mills and lumber schooners—are to be recognized, that the productive energies of other counties, existing in living men, should at least be placed on as dignified a level. Are we about to allow a representation to the wild lands and trees, and the saws of Saginaw which play up and down, moved by the power of steam and water, and not to bones, and sinews, and muscles, and nerves, impelled by a living heart, and prompted by human intellect? Are we to be guilty of such absurdity and injustice?

Mr. WALKER said he was in favor of striking out the word "white." Was it fair or just that females should be enumerated in forming a basis of representation, and other inhabitants excluded? If representation is to be based on the number of voters, why are females, minors, &c., to be counted, and another class of citizens not reckoned. He thought it would be fair to strike out the word. By retaining it great injustice might be done to some sections of the State, particularly new counties, that might by this provision come under the ratio to be established.

Mr. COMSTOCK, at the suggestion of Mr. WILLIAMS, withdrew his motion to strike out the word "white," when,

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to resume the consideration of section 3.

Mr. MORRISON enquired if the motion was in order, as the section had just been passed over by the committee.

The CHAIR—Yes sir. No definite time was named when it was passed by.

The motion to resume the consideration of section 3 was carried, and the question being on the substitute of Mr. CHAPEL for the amendment offered by Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. S., by general consent, withdrew his amendment and offered the following, to be added at the end of section three: "Provided, That until the next apportionment under the census of 1855, the counties of Saginaw, Tuscola, Midland and Gratiot shall be entitled to one representative each; the county of Mackinaw, and the counties thereto attached, to one representative; the counties of Chippewa, Houghton, and Marquette to one representative."

Mr. WHITE moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Lost.

Mr. CHAPEL renewed his substitute: "every organized county containing two thousand white inhabitants shall be entitled to one representative."

Mr. C. said he wished to be liberal with the new counties, and as the proposition of the gentleman from Saginaw [Mr. SUTHERLAND] did not define the number of inhabitants on which a basis was to be made, he thought the number proposed, two thousand, a fair and liberal one. The old counties could afford to be liberal—they ought to be, yet he did not wish the bands of Indians hunting from Canada to be enumerated and form the basis of representation for the new counties.

The substitute was adopted.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to amend section three, line five, by inserting after "inhabitants," the words "and such colored persons and Indians as are taxed." Lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK moved to strike out "white," in fifth line, and insert after "inhabitants," the words "excluding Indians not taxed."

A division of the question being called for, the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. GALE moved to insert after "inhabitants," the words "excluding all aliens." Lost.

Section 4 was read as amended, on the motion of Mr. WOODMAN.

Section 5 being under consideration, Mr. COOK offered the following substitute therefor:

"The State shall be divided into thirty-two districts, to be called Senate districts, each of which shall chose one Senator. The districts shall be numbered from one to thirty-two, inclusive. The Senators chosen by the odd numbered districts shall go out of office at the expiration of two years; the Senators chosen by the even numbered districts shall go out of office at the expiration of four years; and thereafter the Senators shall be chosen for the term of four years. No county shall be divided in the formation of Senate districts except such county shall be equitably entitled to two or more Senators."

Mr. McCLELLAND said he did not perceive why the section as reported by the committee would not apply to the single district system. The provisions were similar to those of Illinois and Iowa, in which States the single district system prevailed. He did not apprehend that any difficulty would grow out of the section, as regarded that system. It might be necessary to insert another section for excess of population similar to that in the constitution of Illinois. [Mr. McC. here read the provision in the constitution of Illinois.] If his friend from Hillsdale [Mr. Cook] would examine, he would find the section to answer the purpose, and applicable to the system he desired.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to amend section 5 by striking out of line 2, the words "from their respective districts."

The motion was carried.

The question recurring on Mr. COOK'S substitute,

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out all that part included between the words "inclusive" and "no county."

Mr. H. said he was in favor of having the entire Senate elected every two years and not one-half only.

Mr. COOK was in favor of that himself; but thought, from the vote yesterday, the Convention decided to elect one-half of the Senate every two years.

The motion of Mr. HANSCOM prevailed, and the question recurring on the substitute as amended, a division was called for.

Section 5 was then stricken out and the substitute adopted.

Section 6 was read.

Mr. COOK moved to amend section 7, by adding at the end thereof the words "and all votes given for any such person shall be void."

Carried.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the word "postmasters," in line one, was stricken out.

Mr. STOREY moved to strike out "notaries public, and officers of the militia and of townships excepted."

But the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. BUSH offered the following substitute for section 7:

"No person holding any United States office or State office, (notaries public and officers of the militia excepted,) shall be eligible to a seat in either house of the Legislature; and votes given for such person shall be void."

Mr. B. said the provision in the present constitution had not been sufficiently understood. Under it the question of the eligibility of certain county officers had been frequently before the Legislature, and it was yet uncertain whether they rightfully held their seats or not. It was urged by some that county and township officers were excluded from holding seats from the very fact that justices of the peace were excepted. He had never been in the Legislature without witnessing some confusion growing out of the election of a county officer, judge, clerk, or some other. If his substitute did not clearly and sufficiently define the matter, he hoped some other gentleman would offer a proposition that would.

Mr. J. CLARK moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Lost.

Mr. CHURCH said he knew no reason why township officers should be excluded from the Legislature. Many of them were well qualified for such duties.

Mr. MORRISON hoped the substitute would not prevail. County officers should remain at home and attend to their official duties. There was as much propriety in keeping them out of the Legislature, as those who held office in the different departments of State.

Mr. EATON—Would you exclude justices of the peace?

Mr. MORRISON—Yes sir. Let them stay at home and perform their duties there. I have known them to go off and take their dockets with them, by which the interest of persons has suffered. I would exclude every one who has official duties at home.

Mr. BUSH said his object in offering the substitute had been accomplished. He wished to draw the attention of the Convention to the subject. If they saw proper to exclude all county officers, he would vote for it. It was the duty of the Convention to put the matter at rest. Many supposed, under the present Constitution, that county officers, save those specially excepted, were excluded from seats in the Legislature. [Mr. B. here read the provision of the Constitution.] But he presumed that most county officers held seats. In the legislature of 1840, there were so many county officers holding seats that it led to great confusion. It was like a two-edged sword.

Mr. McCLELLAND thought the general interpretation of the clause of the Constitution was as stated by the gentleman from Ingham [Mr. BUSH]—that all officers were excluded save those specially excepted. That was the intention of the committee who reported the article under consideration.

He was opposed to excluding justices of the peace, for the reason that if excluded, it might be a difficult matter to get a competent person, out of a village, to fill the office. For the public welfare, the exclusion ought to be as limited as possible. If a justice were doing a good business, he would be unwilling to leave it for a seat in the Legislature.

In regard to the cases of county officers holding seats, mentioned by gentlemen, he believed the question of their eligibility had been referred to committees, but, if rumor was correct, those committees had withheld their reports and the officers thus permitted to remain and hold their seats in the legislature. The question was not settled.

Mr. MORRISON deemed it as necessary to exclude justices as any others. The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McC.] had said that they would not leave a good business to come to the Legislature. His experience taught him better. He had known cases where special elections were necessary to fill vacancies occasioned by the election of justices to the Legislature.

He did not understand the proposition of the gentleman from Ingham [Mr. Bush] to exclude justices, and therefore moved to amend the substitute by inserting the words "county and township officers," so that they would be excluded.

Mr. WOODMAN hoped that path-masters would not be excluded, as he held that office at home.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention resolved itself into committee, and resumed the consideration of the article on the Legislative Department.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered a substitute for section 7, which excepted township officers from being excluded from seats in the Legislature.

Mr. McC. said it seemed to him that the substitute he offered better expressed the sense of the committee than did the original section, or the substitute of the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. Bush.] The design of the committee was, he believed, not to exclude township officers.

Mr. CRARY asked if this proposition, if adopted, would not conflict with another provision in another report. If the report of another committee should be adopted, justices of the peace would become judicial officers. He mentioned it to call attention to that point.

Mr. McCLELLAND thought it the sense of the committee that justices of the peace, as well as all other township officers, should be eligible to a seat in the Legislature; and if there should be a conflict of provisions, it could be remedied hereafter.

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend section 7 so as to read, "No person holding any office under the United States or this State, or any county office, notaries public, officers of the militia and officers elected by townships, excepted, shall be eligible to or have a seat in either house of the Legislature."

Mr. F. thought the amendment would obviate all difficulty that had been apprehended. It would avoid all difficulty of construction, also, by any one, and make the section so that all officers elected in the townships would be eligible to a seat in the Legislature. This he believed to be the sense of the committee. Supervisors and justices of the peace were, in many of their duties, county officers. The supervisor was a representative of his town in the county board, and his duties in such board rendered him a county officer in their discharge.

Every one was aware of the difficulty, particularly in the smaller towns, of obtaining proper persons to fill township offices. The best men of every town were wanted for those places; and if an exclusion from a seat in the Legislature was added to the unprofitable and onerous duties of township officers, he thought it would be sensibly felt in the administration of our town affairs. The idea of an exclusion, whether men were ambitious for a seat in the Legislature or not, would prevent very many of our best men from participating in the burdens of town officers.

Mr. REDFIELD said he should be sorry to see magistrates and supervisors excluded from a seat in these halls. No class of our citizens were so fit to come here as these very men. They had been through a course of proper training to fit them for their duties here, and in no hands could the various interests of the different portions of the state be better committed. He should regret very much to see these classes of our citizens excluded from seats in our legislative halls.

Mr. CORNELL—When a law is framed, it is difficult sometimes to put it into practical operation; that is, its details are not perfect. A very large proportion of our laws are executed by township officers, and their experience in putting them into operation makes them better fitted to point out defects and suggest improvements than almost any other class. An officer, passing up through the different services of a township, must know the minute workings of the laws, and his experience would make him a useful legislator.

Mr. CHURCH—The question seems to be whether justices of the peace and supervisors shall be eligible to a seat in the Legislature, and whether the section as reported would give justices of the peace such a privilege, if they should be made state officers by the adoption of the judiciary report. Whether the original report would meet the expression of views in the committee or not, the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. FRALICK,] it seemed to him, would avoid any misconception, and relieve officers elected in the townships from the exclusory clause.

Mr. McCLELLAND withdrew his substitute.

Mr. GOODWIN—The section under consideration is regarded as susceptible of different constructions, and the amendment of my colleague [Mr. FRALICK] is designed, in part, to remedy the evil. I hold in my hand an amendment I had designed to offer, which I think will render the section more explicit.

It has been remarked that the corresponding section in the present constitution has occasioned a great deal of discussion in the Legislature. It has received a broad construction, and one, I think, not in conformity with its object and intent. It reads as follows: "No person holding any office under the United States, or of this State, officers of the militia, justices of the peace, associate judges of the circuit and county courts, and postmasters, excepted, shall be eligible to either house of the Legislature." One would have supposed that the phraseology would have excluded county officers, yet it is well known they have been admitted to seats. I remember a case that occurred two years ago. A contested election of a county clerk had been returned to the House of Representatives, and he had obtained a certificate of his election. The question came up as to his competency to hold the seat; yet he was permitted to retain it. I understood it was decided that the proper construction of the section was that it merely applied to state officers; in common parlance, officers appointed directly by state authority.

The language of the article before us is similar. It reads, "No person holding any office under the United States or this State, (postmasters, notaries public and officers of the militia and of townships excepted,) shall be eligible to or have a seat in either house of the Legislature." My amendment proposes to take away the plausibility of the present construction, and make the section more explicit. It is as follows: After the words "holding office," to insert, "under the constitution or laws of the United States or of this State." It will put the matter beyond the probability of any ambiguity or misconception.

In reference to the exceptions which would be embraced, of course, they should be made in reference to the object of the provision. As I understand it, the object is two-fold: one to prohibit from seats in the legislature persons who hold office; which would require the performance of duties connected with them during the sessions, so that during that time, the public would not be deprived of their services; another, that individuals who occupy official positions, should not use the influence of their positions to forward their object in obtaining seats in the legislature, and perhaps be led into negligence or unfaithfulness in the performance of their duties. In other words, guarding the purity of elections. This doubtless had its weight as well as the other.

There may perhaps be a further object to act; that one individual should not hold a number of offices at the same time, but that they should be more generally distributed. The two first I consider of the most importance.

Mr. McCLELLAND did not clearly see the point of the suggestion of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. GOODWIN.] He [Mr. McC.] preferred the amendment of Mr. FRALICK as it stood. It provided for every case conceivable—United States, State and county officers, except military and township officers and notaries public—it covered the whole.

Mr. CHURCH—The amendment of Mr. FRALICK is well; but if it takes the modification of the other member from Wayne, [Mr. GOODWIN,] it would be like the man who took medicine when he was well, to make him better, and then—died.

Mr. MORRISON was in favor of excluding township officers from a seat in the legislature. If the remarks of the gentleman from Jackson [Mr. CORNELL] and the gentleman from Cass, [Mr. REDFIELD,] as to the benefits derived from the experience of town officers were correct, they applied with equal force to those who had retired from service in a town capacity, as to those who should be incumbents of those offices. And the same reasoning would apply to all State and county officers. He did not want the article left so loose that it would be moulded to the accommodation of those men who wanted two offices; and therefore supervisors and justices of the peace should be excluded from a seat in the legislature.

Mr. CORNELL—The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. MORRISON] wished to prohibit supervisors and justices of the peace from being members of the legislature. He [Mr. C.] was willing to let the people judge of that matter.

Mr. MORRISON—Why not apply the same principles to judges of the Supreme Court?

Mr. CORNELL—The judges of the Supreme Court are expounders of the law.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "be eligible to or."

Mr. S. had two objects in offering the amendment. 1st: that one duty should not conflict with another; and 2d: that no person should employ one office to enable him to obtain another. Having used one position to secure his election to a seat in the legislature, he might resign his first office, after his election to the latter.

Mr. FRALICK—They are the very words, we want to carry out the wishes just expressed. If he held one office, under the section as it now stands, he would be compelled to resign it before being elected to a seat in the legislature, and not to leave it till after the election, and the make a choice of offices.

Mr. KINGSLEY inquired if notaries public were State officers? If they were to be made so, he would move to strike those words out of the exceptions.

Mr. KINGSLEY withdrew his motion.

Mr. FRALICK'S amendment was then adopted.

Mr. BUSH withdrew his substitute.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said that the committee had once refused to make post masters an exception to the exclusion; but he hoped that the decision, on a further consideration, might be reversed. He did not feel disposed to make a move in the matter; but there might be a difficulty in obtaining good post masters, if they should be thus excluded.

Sec. 9. A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may provide.

Mr. FRALICK moved to insert "members elected to," after "of," in the first line.

Mr. HANSCOM would like the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. FRALICK] to give a reason for his proposition.

Mr. FRALICK—Much difficulty has arisen upon the construction of our present constitution where similar words have been used. I am for having the matter fixed certain, beyond the possibility of misconstruction.

Mr. HANSCOM—The strictness of the amendment might be well in other cases, but this section is well enough as it is.

The amendment was lost.

Sec. 10. Each house shall choose its own officers, and shall determine the rules of its proceedings, and judge of the qualifications, elections and returns of its own members; and may, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected, expel a member; but no member shall be expelled a second time for the same cause, nor for any cause known to his constituents antecedent to his election; and the reason for such expulsion shall be entered upon the journal, with the names of the members voting on the question.

Mr. HASCALL would inquire of members better acquainted with matters of legislation than himself, if some other method—something simpler and cheaper—could not be devised for settling the seats of contesting members? Whether claimants might not go before some judge at chambers, with their statements and proofs; and the decision of the judge be final? When a legislative body was closely balanced between parties, members were very apt to be biased by their political prejudices, and great injustice might be, as it often had been, done.

Mr. WALKER said that they had had some experience in Macomb county, with the method suggested by the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL;] and the practical workings of the system, he thought, not very favorable. They had had a contest for the office of judge of probate, but the one who got his seat had served out his term of office before a decision was had in the case.

Mr. MOORE would call the attention of the committee to the 32d section of the article under consideration, which provides that in cases of a contested seat, the person only who is declared entitled to it, shall receive per diem compensation or mileage.

Mr. McCLELLAND looked upon the provision last alluded to as a sovereign panacea for all the evils of which complaint had heretofore been made.

Sec. 11. Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same, except such parts as may require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the request of one-fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal. Any member of either house shall have liberty to dissent from and protest against any act or resolution which he may think injurious to the public or an individual, and have the reason of his dissent entered on the journal.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out "except such parts as may require secrecy," in the first and second lines. Mr. R. saw no reason for its retention in the article.

Mr. McCLELLAND observed that it was a clause which was in all the constitutions of the different States. It had been reported in this article, because exigencies might arise in which the proceedings of the legislature should be done in secret. In case of an invasion or insurrection, the necessities of the case might require such a course.

The motion was lost.

Mr. COOK said that the right of protesting had taken up a great deal of time in our legislative bodies, and he thought this section might be made a little more definite, to obviate any future disagreement as to the extent of the right intended to be conferred. Some had heretofore contended that the term "act," referred to a motion or decision of the chair; while others thought it only applied to a law, resolution or vote. The proper and definite construction might, and should be, agreed upon now, to prevent useless contentions and discussions hereafter. One branch of the legislature, last winter, was occupied about a week in discussing this question, to no benefit to the public. He suggested that the word "passed," after "resolution," would remedy the defect of the section.

Mr. HANSCOM was a looker-on in the scene alluded to by the gentleman from Hillsdale, [Mr. Cook;] and there was a great deal of useless discussion, and a waste of time to no purpose; the majority was at last worried out by the untiring exertions of the minority. He could not, however, agree with the last gentleman's views, nor the amendment suggested. He looked upon the article as securing essential rights to the minority, and was in favor of extending to them all the rights and privileges they would ask. They should have the right not only to protest against any act or resolution passed, but against any proceeding which might be an encroachment on their rights. He would therefore move to insert "proceeding," after the word "act."

Mr. COOK thought members should not have the privilege of protesting against any trivial or private act that might be done in a legislative body—acts that concerned no one but the private feelings of members—but only against acts which concern the public. He would move to insert after "resolution," the word "passed."

Mr. McCLELLAND—Such an amendment would produce more trouble than we have now. It was extremely difficult to provide for all the troubles of the legislature; but this amendment seemed to him to leave greater room for difficulty as well as for a greater infringement on the rights of the minority. A fair construction of the article, as reported, would permit, as it ought to permit, Senators to protest against the acts of the Senate, and members of the House against the acts of the House. But what would be the effect of this amendment? Suppose a bill introduced should pass one house, and go on to its final passage in the other, and there be defeated. The right to protest, in the house in which the bill originated, falls with the defeat of the bill in the other house. The right of protesting is a privilege which ought to be given to the minority.

Mr. COOK modified his amendment by striking out "act," and inserting "passage of any bill." That would remedy the evil alluded to by the last gentleman, and give the right to protest against all acts that concerned the public. To give the right to protest against all doings of that body was giving too broad a latitude.

Mr. BUSH was in favor of the amendment offered by Mr. HANSCOM. Great injustice to individuals and minorities had been done by the action of our legislative bodies. He alluded to a case where the Senate majority refused to enter a respectful protest on its journals, against the actions of that body. The whole matter had been suppressed, except what had been stated through the newspapers.

Mr. HANSCOM said that he believed in the absolute right of minorities to protest against any proceeding that might occur in the course of legislative proceeding. The want of such a provision had worked great injustice, and led to almost interminable conflict and discussion. The last session of our legislature furnished sufficient illustration of the propriety and necessity of the amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAND said no reasonable request to enter a protest on the journals should be denied. But in times of high excitement, when a majority desired to accomplish a certain thing, they would do that thing; throw around them all the restrictions and guards you please, if they were determined to do the thing, they would do it. Such, his observation had taught him, was the fact.

Mr. COOK had never known a protest kept off the journals, which related to acts which concerned the public. They were the only proper ones to find a place on the journals, and not those in reference to their own quarrels and difficulties.

Mr. HANSCOM'S amendment was then adopted.

Mr. COOK withdrew his amendment.

Sec. 15. Every bill passed by the legislature shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor; if he approves it, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to that house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members present agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other house, by whom it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved also by two-thirds of all the members present in that house, it shall become a law; but in such case, the vote of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of members voting for or against the bill shall be entered on the journals of each house respectively; and if any bill be not returned by the Governor within ten days, Sundays excepted, after it has been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the legislature, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall not become a law. But the Governor may approve and sign and file in the office of the Secretary of State, within five days after the adjournment of the two houses, any act passed during the last five days of the session; in which case it shall become a law.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out "two-thirds," wherever it occurred in the section, and insert instead, "majority of all members elected."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped that the amendment would not prevail. It would throw the power of passing a bill over the objections of the Governor into too few hands.

Mr. McCLELLAND said he was aware there had been objections to investing the Executive with the veto power; but upon examination, he thought these objections would yield to reflection and reason. Perhaps no individual had experienced more than himself, the direct disadvantages growing out of the exercise of this power; yet he regarded it as one of the most salutary provisions of a Constitution. Without it, [said Mr. Mc.,] what would our own State have been? And if there had been more firmness on the part of the Executives—if the veto had been applied to numerous measures of our State legislation—how different would have been the condition of the State? Her prosperity would have been far in advance of what it is at this period, and her reputation without blemish.

Upon the excitement and impulse of the moment, we were apt to suppose the veto power dangerous and oppressive; as yielding too much into the hands, and to the discretion of one man; but upon sober reflection, a calm survey of its practical effects must convince all of its soundness and practicability.

The people of the United States admitted it to be a wise and salutary means of protecting the interests of the country; and while certain localities might, in some instances, suffer from its exercise, and feel aggrieved, yet the masses were satisfied. He felt no disposition to argue the matter, yet, if necessary, he was prepared to discuss the question, in all its latitude, now or hereafter.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE had no doubt of the correctness of the assertion that if the Governors of this State had more frequently exercised this power we should have been in a far more prosperous condition. If the amendment pending should be lost, he would move to amend so as to require a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to pass a bill over the objections of the Governor.

Mr. HANSCOM's amendment was then lost.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out "present," where it occurred in the section, and insert "elected." Carried.

Sec. 17. The members of the Legislature shall receive for their services three dollars a day for actual attendance except absent from sickness, for the first sixty days of the session of 1851, and for the first forty days of every subsequent session, and nothing more. When convened in extra session by the governor, they shall receive three dollars a day for the first twenty days, and no more, and shall legislate on no other subjects than those expressly stated in the governor's proclamation. They shall also receive ten cents for every mile they shall actually travel in going to and returning from their place of meeting, on the usually traveled route; and for stationery and newspapers not exceeding five dollars for each member during any session.

Mr. WILLARD moved to strike out "three," and insert "two," as the per diem of the members.

Mr. S. CLARK said he was in favor of striking out three dollars and inserting two, and believed that instead of destroying the character of the legislative body it would improve it. The position would no longer be sought after by interested men, eager for the spoils. It will not be by that class of men so eagerly sought for; but the people will select the best men to represent their views. There will be no difficulty in obtaining members of talent to represent the people, and he hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE asked if the object of the gentleman, to prevent men seeking the place for the spoils, could not be better accomplished by striking out all pay, and place us on the same ground with the British Parliament.

Mr. EATON was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Van Buren, [Mr. WILLARD.] His constituents were more liberal than to require such a parsimonious measure of the Convention. He had heard the matter discussed at home, and they would be satisfied with the adoption of biennial sessions, without reducing the present per diem of members. Who would be willing to go to the legislature and sacrifice his time for two dollars per day?

Mr. McCLELLAND said there were those who favored a reduction in the per diem allowance of members; yet, from the retrenchment intended to be carried out in the legislative and other state departments, he thought there would be no necessity for reducing the pay of members. He had taken pains to ascertain the expenses of several sessions of the legislature, and prepared the following table of expenses, together with an estimate of the expense of two years under the present recommendation.

1850 "	583 50
1849 Postage,	2,868 70
1850 "	1,840 13
1849 Stationery,	425 00
1850 "	440 00
1849 Pay of members and mileage,	31,042 60
1850 " " "	31,359 93

(Mileage about $2,000 included in foregoing.)

Probable amount by present recommendation.

1851 Postage on matter received merely,	$400 00
Pay of members, sixty days,	14,840 00
Serg't-at-arms, clerk, &c.,	900 00
Stationery and newspapers,	352 00
Stationery for clerk, &c.,	50 00
	<hr/> $16,542 00

Difference, $52,624 51

Showing that under biennial sessions, there would be a saving to the State, in two years, of fifty-two thousand six hundred and twenty-four dollars. Postage in 1843, when he was a member, under the high rates of postage, was $247 67.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I trust, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from Van Buren [Mr. WILLARD] will prevail. The county of Oakland, which I have the honor in part to represent, requires not only that the sessions of the legislature shall be shortened, but the pay of members reduced. I have, sir, in my pocket, a letter from a highly respectable citizen of that county, which states that that matter was a test question. I hope that members will come up to the scratch.

Mr. RAYNALE—Who is the gentleman who wrote the letter?

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—Hiram Barrett, whom the gentleman has often met.

Mr. WOODMAN must say one word. Honor and fairness required it of him. His constituents never expected him to vote for two dollars per day for the pay of members. Friend Barrett, to whom his colleague [Mr. VAN V.] alluded, had been a member of the legislature, and if you search the record you will find that he always voted for three dollars per day. He said he would not, but he did.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—Those were days of darkness—these are days of reform and light. I hope that this stigma will not attach to Mr. Barrett.

Mr. COMSTOCK had no instructions on this particular question, from his constituents, yet he was willing and ready to enter on any work of reform. He believed the people would be satisfied with the reform and retrenchments already canvassed—biennial sessions, single districts, &c.

Mr. ROBERTSON—We are in favor of reform in Macomb, inasmuch as we have thought that heretofore it has been the habit of the legislature to rob the treasury; but I think it will be a poor method to revenge ourselves by robbing those who are to come here, for the excesses of those who have preceded them.

My colleague and myself have received letters from Macomb, in which the citizens express themselves in favor of three dollars per day. They are willing to allow this, but they want biennial sessions—they want the first session to be limited to sixty days—for which they are willing to pay three dollars per day, and one dollar per day for all over sixty days; but they certainly misunderstood the price of board in Lansing, when they spoke of one dollar.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—All that has been said resolves itself into a matter of dollars and cents.

Suppose that the pay is reduced to two dollars per day, with a session of forty days. The board and incidental expenses cannot be estimated at less than seven dollars per week, so that of the amount received, forty dollars has gone and he has forty dollars left.

The expense of the outfit of course is something—the expense of election is said nothing about.

Now is this a reasonable compensation—are these men, who thus talk, in earnest? Who will come here if his services are not considered worth one dollar per day? Who will come here for that compensation? And I would ask if those men whose services are worth nothing should come here and serve the State?

No man can come here without the loss of time and money—no man can leave his business without a sacrifice. It is a sacrifice to many a man who comes here at three dollars per day; for we know that many have refused to sit in the legislature, because they could not submit to the sacrifice, even when the session was ninety or one hundred days in length. When it is reduced to forty days the pay will be a matter of no consideration, and I cannot think these men are serious.

Mr. WILLARD was serious in the matter. Three dollars per day might be necessary for those members who couldn't wear pantaloons without straps, and must have their wine dinners every day at the Benton House. Members were not compelled to dress finely, and there were cheaper boarding houses in town. Two dollars was enough, and he should follow the matter up.

Mr. CHAPEL would suggest the propriety of adding the words "and roast beef."

Mr. N. PIERCE—Mr. Chairman, I have always been of opinion that two dollars a day was enough—but when the report of the committee was made, I thought they had guarded it very well. They had shortened the session so that I felt to go along with them; but I am persuaded that two dollars a day is enough. I can board here and take care of myself for one dollar a day. I think the State should not hire men and pay them extra. I think you could get men to come here for two dollars a day—good men and capable. I think there would not be so much fuss about the election, but you would get good men.

As the committee had reported to shorten the session, my feelings was to go with the committee—with the report—I was satisfied—but I shall go with the gentleman from Van Buren. I think two dollars enough. I think a man can live here with prudent policy and save a dollar a day, and I think that enough. When they are elected it is fun; but it is no fun when they come here. It is like the fisherman who put the fishing against the fun, and all the fish he got was clear gain.

Mr. KINGSLEY believed the people would be satisfied if the sessions were shortened and biennial sessions adopted.

Mr. MOORE thought two dollars per day sufficient. He believed we should have better legislators than heretofore.

Mr. AMMON BROWN thought two dollars would go further now, to support members, than three would in times past. He should go for two dollars.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH felt bound to defend his absent friend, Mr. Barrett.

[Mr. VAN V. then read from a copy of the journal of the legislature to prove that Mr. Barrett, when a member, had voted for two dollars a day for the pay of members.]

A division of the question being called for on Mr. WILLARD's amendment, the committee refused to strike out.

Section 17 was amended, on motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, by inserting in 1st line, after the word "services," the word "only;" by striking out "unless," in the second line, and inserting "and when;" by striking out "more," in third line and inserting "thereafter," and by striking out "no more," in fourth line and inserting "nothing thereafter."

On motion of Mr. WALKER, section 17 was amended by inserting after "proclamation," in 5th line, "or submitted to them by his special message."

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman reported the article back to the Convention and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. J. CLARK, the Convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (15th day,) June 19.

The Convention met at the usual hour and was called to order by the PRESIDENT. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. HANSCOM: of MOSES S. COLLINS and 299 others, citizens of the county of Washtenaw, praying that the elective franchise be extended to every male citizen over the age of 21 years. Referred.

By Mr. BUSH: of 89 citizens of the town of Lansing, asking that the word "white" may be stricken from the Constitution. Referred.

REPORTS.

Mr. WALKER, from the committee on education, submitted a report accompanied by "Article —. Education."

The article was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Article —. Education.

1. There shall be elected at each general election by the qualified electors of the State, a Superintendent of Public Instruction, who shall hold his office for the term of two years, and shall have the general supervision of public instruction, and whose duties shall be prescribed by law.

2. The proceeds from the sale of all lands that have been or hereafter may be granted by the United States to this State, for the support of schools, shall be and remain a perpetual fund, the interest of which, together with the rents of all such lands as remain unsold, shall be inviolably appropriated to the support of primary schools throughout the State, and shall be annually distributed for such purpose, upon such fair and equitable basis as shall be provided by law.

3. The legislature shall establish by law a system of primary schools, by which such schools shall be kept in each and every school district, for at least three months in each year, free and without any charge for tuition, to all children between the ages of four and eighteen years, and shall provide that any deficiency that may exist after the distribution of the primary school interest fund, shall be raised in the several townships and cities, by a tax upon the whole taxable property in such townships and cities respectively. And the English language, and no other, shall be taught in such schools.

4. There shall be elected at the first general election in this State after the ratification of this Constitution, six Regents of the University, two for the term of six years, two for the term of four years, and two for the term of two years; and at each subsequent election there shall be two Regents of the University elected, who shall hold their office for the term of six years.

5. The Regents of the University shall, at their first annual meeting, or as soon thereafter as may be, elect a President of the University of Michigan, who shall be ex officio a member of their board, and shall preside at the meetings of said Regents, and who shall be the principal executive of the University. Said Board of Regents shall have the general supervision of the University, and the direction and control of all expenditures from the University interest fund.

6. The proceeds from the sale of all lands that have been or may hereafter be granted by the United States to this State, for the support of a University, and all funds accruing from any other source, for the purpose aforesaid, shall be and remain a perpetual fund, the interest of which, together with the rents of all such lands as may remain unsold, shall be inviolably appropriated to the support of the University, with such branches as the public good may require for the promotion of literature and the arts and sciences.

7. There shall be elected at the first general election in this State, after the ratification of this Constitution, three members of the State Board of Education, one for the term of two years, one for the term of four years, and one for the term of six years; and at each succeeding biennial election, there shall be one member of said board elected, who shall hold his office for the term of six years. The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be ex-officio a member and secretary of said board. Said board shall have the general supervision of the State Normal School, and their duties shall be prescribed by law.

8. The proceeds from the sale of all lands that have been or shall be hereafter granted or appropriated for the use of the State Normal School, shall be and remain a perpetual fund, the interest of which, together with the rents and profits of such of said lands as shall remain unsold, shall be inviolably appropriated for the support of said Normal School.

9. The legislature shall encourage, by all suitable means, the promotion of intellectual, scientific and agricultural improvement; and shall, as soon as practicable, provide for the establishment of an agricultural school, with a model farm in connection therewith. The legislature shall also provide for the establishment of at least one library in each township; and the money which shall be paid by all persons as an exemption from military duty, and all fines assessed in the several counties for any breach of the penal laws, shall be exclusively applied to the support of said libraries.

A motion was made to print the usual number of copies of the report accompanying the article.

Mr. CHURCH—I object, Mr. President, to the printing of the report which the chairman of the committee on education has brought in with the article which he has submitted in behalf of that committee. Such a report is unprecedented in the history of our proceedings; it is in direct violation of the positive instructions of this Convention, contained in the resolution adopted on the 7th of June. There is no propriety, sir, in the making of such a written report, against the instructions I refer to, and against the practice we have heretofore established in this respect.

The printing of this report will increase the bill of expense, now too great, and which our necessary printing will make large enough. Nor can it be of any use. The subject this report discusses will be disposed of before the report can be circulated wide enough and sent far enough to make much impression upon the public mind.

The object of the resolution of June 7th was, that no pre-occupation of the public mind, by the peculiar views of a committee, should be attempted by written reports; that each article submitted to the Convention should stand for favor or disfavor upon the merits or defects of its provisions apparent upon its face.

Why should an exception be made upon this particular topic and as regards this committee? If there be here an especial desire to instruct us or to make a personal display, let it be done upon the floor of this Convention, in oral and open debate.

Did the chairman of the committee on the Legislative Department—whose article, lately presented to us, contained important and radical changes, reaching to the business and bosoms of men—make a long rhetorical report in writing? No, sir! He made a few verbal explanations, and those only because afflictive intelligence called him from this Convention.

Have the chairmen of other committees made such reports? No, sir! Print this report; make this a precedent; and by and by the chairman of the committee on miscellaneous provisions will make a written report, in connection with the article he may submit, as long as himself! I object, sir, therefore to the printing of this report.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I hope that the report will be printed. I do not know how members will understand the report without it is printed. I do not understand it yet myself, and I want to examine the printed report.

Mr. CORNELL—I think that it is an important subject; as much as any that will come before this Convention, and I hope that the report may go to the people to let them examine it. In the first session of the legislature after we became a State, a law was passed which would have rendered the schools nearly free. Many objected to it and the provision was rejected; so that many who were entitled to a free education were deprived of it. Now I think that the people are in favor of it, but still I think that it should be fairly presented, that public opinion may be fully formed. In the section that I have the honor to represent it is considered as important a feature as any in the Constitution.

Mr. HANSCOM—It is the first time in the whole course of my experience that I ever knew an attempt made to deprive a standing committee of the privilege of printing their report.

The committee on education have endeavored to engraft a new principle in the feature of our common schools, which, although just will meet with the most embittered opposition in some portions of the State.

The committee have chosen to present their reasons to induce the favorable action of the Convention, and justice to the committee, and to the people of Michigan, requires that the report shall be printed in company with the article, and I am surprised at the objection that has been made.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I hope the report may be printed. The gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] seems to have taken in the whole meaning. Dull people like me require a little more time. This body has ordered a committee upon an important subject. Much investigation has been given to the consideration of the subject, and the result is presented in the form of a report.

The committee have reported in favor of a change of vast importance to the people of this State. A change that I believe is called for by the largest number; at any rate, called for by the majority of the northern part of the State. If the old system would enable us to have schools free, then I should be opposed to this system; but it does not. And we ought to adopt a system of free schools, and if we lay our reasons before the people, in the first place, by publishing the report giving them the views of the committee, more light may be thrown upon the subject. I therefore hope that the report may be printed.

Mr. CHURCH—I don't care much about the matter; but it seems to me it was the business of the committee to report merely the article. Such has been the usual practice. The committee on the legislative department presented an article which contemplated important and radical changes, and all the report that was made was a few verbal explanations made by the chairman. We should remember that we are not a legislative body. And I contend that in framing a constitution we should not have reports written to be printed in advance, giving the friends of any particular measure undue influence.

My only reason for objecting is, that the precedent shall not be established, giving an opportunity for personal display.

Mr. SKINNER—I am not only in favor of printing the report, but am in favor of printing a larger number. It is probably the most important measure that will come before this Convention. I hope it will be printed, as I should like to send some to my constituents. I move, therefore, that 800 copies be printed.

Mr. FRALICK—I would like to know what would be the number printed in the ordinary manner.

Mr. GARDINER—Four hundred and eighty.

Mr. COOK moved that it be laid upon the table in order to be printed.

Mr. CHURCH withdrew his motion.

On motion of Mr. SKINNER, double the usual number of copies of the accompanying report were ordered printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS,

Resolved, That the committee on printing be instructed to direct the State Printer to print the debates of this Convention in such form and on such type as they may deem prudent and serviceable.

Mr. ROBERTSON would like to know the object,

Mr. GARDINER said that many of the members were dissatisfied with the publication of the reports in the present form. The Convention passed a resolution, it will be recollected, that reports shall be published in octavo form, and this publication is in octavo form.

Mr. CRARY—What is an octavo form?

Mr. GARDINER—It is the usual octavo form on a medium sheet—imperial is double that of medium. I would say that the committee had suggested and agreed upon a different form; but on examination of the resolution of the Convention, we found that we had no discretion in the matter.

It is proposed to print the number ordered for distribution in the manner now done, and that the other for the book form, shall be printed in brevier type, like that of the Ohio Convention. The contract with the State Printer binds him to use the usual type. The brevier type cannot be procured here in consequence of the printer not being bound to use it. Therefore the committee thought it best that the usual number should be printed in the present form, and that the book shall be published in brevier type, as the present form will make a volume of an unwieldy size. The expense will be partly saved by compressing it in a small type. What the difference will be in dollars and cents, I do not know, but it will not be very material. A large amount will be saved in paper; the paper which is used is rather costly. Therefore, it was proposed that the committee upon printing have it printed in the form and manner that they may deem expedient. We ask that the Convention may give this power to the committee or take some definite action, as I am sensible it ought to be changed. The book will be placed in the archives of the State, and in every town in each county, and I think it ought to be a volume of a more respectable appearance than in the present form, and I think that a few dollars will be well saved by printing a better copy.

The resolution was carried.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of "Article —, Legislative Department," Mr. WELLS in the chair.

Section 17 was read. "The members of the legislature shall receive for their services three dollars a day for actual attendance, unless absent from sickness, for the first sixty days of the session of 1851, and for the first forty days of every subsequent session and nothing more. When convened in extra session by the Governor, they shall receive three dollars a day for the first twenty days, and no more, and shall legislate on no other subjects than those expressly stated in the Governor's proclamation. They shall also receive ten cents for every mile they shall actually travel in going to or returning from their place of meeting, on the usually traveled route; and for stationery and newspapers not exceeding five dollars for each member during any session.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend as follows:

Add to section 17 the words: "Each member of the legislature shall be entitled to one copy of the laws, journals and documents of the legislature of which he was a member; but the legislature shall not at the expense of the State, provide for its members books, newspapers and other perquisites of office not expressly authorized by this constitution."

Which amendment was concurred in.

Sec. 18. The legislature may provide by law for the payment of all mailable matter received by the members, Lieutenant Governor and Speaker, but not for any sent or mailed by them.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to amend section 18 by inserting after "matter," in the first line, the words, "sent and," and by striking out, in the last line, the words, "but not for any sent or mailed by them."

Mr. B. said by retaining the section as it stands, we shall deprive our constituents of privileges, not the members.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I would say that the object of the committee was to prevent the practice that the gentleman who last spoke is in favor of. This is a practice that has grown up within a few years past, until the postage bill has been increased to an enormous amount. The committee thought it was not proper for the State to pay for matter sent by members to their constituents, for the reason that, as a general thing, members would not be able to send any legislative matter to more than 50 out of 1,000 of their constituents. That if the matter was of any importance the constituents would be glad to receive it and pay the postage, and not compel the State to pay; thus granting a privilege to 50 persons, that you do not to the 950.

I think this franking privilege wrong in principle. You have a journal or other legislative matter to send; you don't send to your whole constituency, but to some particular friend;—obliging a few at the expense of the many. That is the effect of the practice which has recently obtained. Was there any complaint under the old rule?

A MEMBER—What was the reason that the new rule was established?

Mr. McCLELLAND—I cannot tell. No man has given a good reason for it. To show the difference, I will give some statistics: In 1843 under the old rule to pay the postage on mailable matter received, but not for matter sent, the whole amount of postage paid, was $247 67. In 1849, under the new rule the postage bill was $2,168 70; and in 1850 it was $1,840 43.

I ask the members if it is right that, for the benefit of 50 or 60 out of 1,000, you should compel your constituents to pay a tax like this? If you give this franking privilege, I defy the legislature to throw guards around it so as to prevent frauds. I have been told that it has been the practice of members of the legislature as it has been the practice of members of Congress, to frank matter that did not come within the intent and meaning of the law; and I appeal to any post masters here present, to say if such frauds can be easily detected.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—It appears to me that if the doctrine laid down by the 18th section is carried out, it will deprive the constituents of their privilege. The gentleman from Monroe says that not more than 50 persons will receive the documents out of 1000. That may be so; but those 50 documents may be presented in such a way that all the constituents may read them. Fraud may have been practiced; but it appears to me that it can easily be prevented. The post masters can examine the documents, and it can easily be told whether the parcel is such as is allowed by law. I am speaking merely for the sake of the constituents. If we carry out the doctrine, it will give the legislature a pretext for hiding their actions.

They may say, we cannot present you our proceedings because the State will not pay the postage, and we cannot afford it ourselves. And thus the legislature may hide their proceedings from the people, and a great deal of injury ensue.

With regard to letters, of course frauds may be practiced, and my amendment provides an exception being made as to letters sent.

I merely wish constituents to have the privilege of receiving legislative documents, postage paid by the State.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I should wish this provision to be retained, and I believe that nearly every member of this Convention will bear me out in my remark when I say that the matter sent is nearly useless. The journals contain no intelligible or certain information, as amended and changed in the progress of our proceedings, and what do our constituents know of the final result of measures from the journals sent; and without the articles and all the journals, what connection is there, and how can they understand them?

It is our duty to guard against all expense, even if it is a small amount; it is our duty to guard the treasury, and this matter has grown to be such an abuse that it ought to be stopped.

I shall be in favor of extending this privilege with regard to this Convention; but I consider the sending the journal as merely complimentary. What we send to-day may be altered to-morrow; hence, it is nearly useless.

Mr. REDFIELD—I am in favor of restricting the franking privilege. The amount of the postage has been shown, and the privilege is confined to a very few who receive but little benefit from the occasional numbers sent. They are sent irregularly; they contain nothing that gives an idea of the chain of business. If cut off entirely, the community would be better off, the public journals would be better supported; many would become subscribers to a public paper instead of depending upon an occasional document. They would then come in possession of something tangible. Thousands would do this and then lay them away as papers of reference, and I wish that the franking privilege might be entirely abolished.

Mr. BUSH—The gentleman from Monroe said that there was a great difference between the expense of the postage between the years 1843 and 1849. I am in favor of the provision of the committee as it now stands; but I wish to explain how so great a difference came to exist. In 1843 any journal might be sent without pre-payment of postage—under the present law, no document can be sent unless pre-paid, so that the postage must fall upon the member—that was the case in 1849. The Legislature has been in the habit of sending out documents, and under the old law they had a right to send them, but by the present law they cannot go without they are pre-paid.

Mr. COOK—I was a member of the legislature in the year 1848. A good many members were opposed to it. My vote is recorded against it. It is better to have a provision of this kind and I should be glad to see it adopted here, although the Convention have thought otherwise. The reason why this was passed was, that Congress had altered the law, that no document should be sent except pre-paid, prohibiting thereby the practice which had been adopted before, allowing the members to send them and the constituents to pay. Under the circumstances, the members not being willing, probably not able to pay all the postage, it was thought best by the majority to send some at the expense of the State.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH proposed to amend—"except the documents of said legislature." Our duty to our constituents demands this at our hands; it is a practice that has been followed for a number of years and they expect it from us. They have a right to know what their servants are about, while we are here in the capacity of legislators. Shall we shut them out? Shall we not let them look at our proceedings, and are we not in effect doing it when we say to the members, you shall have no power to frank documents to them? I am in favor of radical reform, and I would begin at home. I would reduce the pay of members to less than three dollars per day; but I would not shut out from our constituents all knowledge of our transactions. Is it just; is it right? Will they not say that we are liberal only when our own interests are concerned; that we are in favor of continuing the highest per diem allowance while we deprive our constituents of the pittance of a journal. It has been said that but a few of our constituents obtain the benefit of these documents. How can that be? We scatter these documents through the country. They are read by the whole neighborhood—they are read with avidity. They desire to know what their servants are about, and it appears to me that only those who are afraid of retributive justice which will follow them, are in favor of this shutting out their proceedings from the public eye. I hope that this will prevail. I hope that we shall show ourselves to our constituents in a proper light; that we shall not be afraid to have them look into our conduct.

It was said by one gentleman that he should be glad to have the eyes of the whole State upon us. I should be glad to have the eyes of every constituent upon the legislature, to restrain them in those wanderings which legislators are sometimes guilty of. I hope it will prevail.

Mr. S. CLARK—I think there is some mistake. I wish if there are any postmasters here they would state how the matter is; but, as I understand it, newspapers only must be pre-paid; not public documents. But whether so or not, I am opposed to the amendment. The documents that we send out are mere trash, which those who receive them will not read. I do think that we should incur no unnecessary expense, and that the practice should not be allowed.

Mr. CRARY—The arguments of the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH] seem to be that we are afraid of our constituents. I should like to know how any expression can be obtained in a session of forty days. It is not likely that our constituents will get much light until the end of the session, at which time they can get full information in a proper manner and in a proper form.

Mr. BRITAIN said—Mr. President, the evils of this practice of printing and sending the journals and documents by members of the legislature to a few of their constituents, at the expense of the State, are too numerous to be perceived at a single glance. A person must be intimately acquainted with the details of legislative business to see all the evils resulting from it. I do not propose to speak of the evils to which the attention of the committee has already been called, but will allude to some of them, to which the attention of the Convention has not been called.

If you authorize the sending of journals and documents at public expense, every man will, as he has a right to, expect them sent to him; and yet, if a member devote his entire time to it, he could reach but a few of his constituents; and the first man he meets on his return home may be a neglected one, who may say with truth and with a significance which few members can misunderstand, "Why, I have not heard from you during the session!" Such persons feel themselves aggrieved and neglected, and well they may; for how can the legislature be justified while taking money from the pockets of one portion of their constituency to pay for printing and sending journals and documents to another portion of them?

But the expense of printing and of postage on these unequally distributed favors is not all. It requires the time of the members here, which ought to be devoted to public business; and the noise, rattling and confusion unavoidably occasioned by the folding, enveloping and superscribing of these documents, often render it difficult and sometimes impossible for members to hear amendments proposed, or even made to bills—draws the attention of members from the legitimate business of the house, and brings them to vote upon questions to which they have paid no attention, and thus not only renders the legislature an inefficient body, but its legislation even dangerous.

Nor is this picture at all exaggerated—it has been so heretofore—it will be so hereafter, so long as the process of folding, enveloping and superscription of these documents is permitted during the business hours of the respective houses.

I now wish to ask the Convention, if there is any necessity for continuing this unjust and expensive system? Is there no other way in which legislative proceedings can reach the people upon more equitable terms; and if so, are we not morally bound to provide it?

If the Convention will permit me to trespass a few moments longer upon their time,

I will point out a much better way in which I think legislative proceedings can be furnished to the people. Require your State Printer to furnish by mail to the publishers of every newspaper in the State, copies of the documents, bills and daily journals printed by him for the State; these publishers could publish said proceedings as cheaply as any other reading matter, and would of course publish them whenever desired by public sentiment. The public having their attention directed to the subject, would at once perceive that every subscriber for a newspaper could be furnished with legislative proceedings without any inconvenience or additional expense to himself, and would at once demand it. In this way you would not only secure increased patronage to the publishers, by rendering their columns more interesting to the reading public, but by the expenditure of the small sum of from one dollar and a half to two dollars per day, during the session, for printing and postage, you save the time of your members of the legislature, remove one great cause of noise and confusion from each house, leave the undivided attention of members for their legislative business, and save the State from an expenditure of from three to four thousand dollars annually for printing and postage, and that, too, from being drawn from the pockets of all the people for the purpose of sending now and then a document or journal, to but a small portion of the people; and I trust that this Convention will at once and forever put an end to a practice so impolitic in its expenditure and so unjust in its operation.

Mr. J. CLARK—I have had the honor and the pleasure of being a post-master, and I would state to the Convention that the law of Congress gives post-masters and legislative bodies certain privileges. All public documents are permitted to pass through the post-office without being prepaid. Therefore I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Eaton.

It seems to me that the Convention must see the necessity of putting a check upon the expenditure of the Legislature in future, if they intend to be as lavish as they have been.

Another point, sir; if we continue the system that we ourselves are pursuing, we shall be ashamed to return home with a statement of the expenses that have been incurred for postage by this Convention. I suppose that the expense has already amounted to two hundred dollars; and what for? For the journals, &c., useless to the people, that you see thrown upon your floor before your clerk. And unless you take steps to prevent it, it will be productive of much mischief. To prevent this, I was in favor of allowing each member more than three dollars to arrange his postage matters, as well as the stationery he would require. Members should not have the State pay these expenses. Let members pay it themselves, and don't let it be charged to the State. If five dollars are not enough, let us give them ten dollars; but let us fix the amount. If in one session of the Legislature nearly two thousand dollars were spent for postage, six or seven hundred will be spent by this Convention.

Mr. HASCALL—These legislative documents are scattered all over the country indiscriminately. Men frequently receive four or five copies of documents and journals of the same kind and the same date, all prepaid by the State, and only one of which can be of any possible use to the receiver; thus, absolutely throwing away the money of the people, without any substantial benefit therefrom.

I recollect, during the last session of the legislature in Detroit, being the publisher of a newspaper, of receiving some half a dozen or more of the journals of each house, of the same date, from various members and Senators, with three cents postage paid on each. All, but one copy of each, were absolutely worthless to me, and were destroyed as waste paper. This is the experience of every publisher in the State.

As these documents can, at best, be received but by a few persons. they can furnish no general information. Therefore, it is unjust to tax those who do not receive them, and require them to pay for what is enjoyed by others.

Again, the system is unjust to newspaper publishers, whose papers ought to be looked to as the source for legislative information; and much more pains would be taken by publishers to give full and accurate accounts, were they not forestalled by this indiscriminate distribution of journals, &c., throughout the country. The matter should be corrected, and much useless printing will be saved thereby. Let us set the example here, with the hope that it will be followed by the legislature.

Mr. BAGG said: Mr. Chairman, I perfectly agree with the various gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, in regard to the journals sent daily from this body, particularly with the gentleman from Berrien. One word with regard to newspapers. Sir, for the last week I have been so disgusted with the trash of matter, in the form of newspapers upon our tables, that I have read nothing but the deaths and marriages. While a majority of them, through the medium of their scribblers or correspondents at this place, have perverted the truth, and given a false coloring to the action of this body, of individual members on this floor; the other portion labor to puff up and sustain the most indolent, lazy and corrupt members, without giving any credit to industrious members, who are always laboring in committee or are found in their seats in this hall. They give to our constituents and the world any thing but the truth of the deliberations of this body. Our constituents will remain in the dark on these subjects, until they receive a correct copy of the debates and proceedings of this body from the hands of our reporters. By analogy, the same results may be anticipated in our legislatures. Therefore, I hope the section as reported by the committee, will remain without amendment.

Mr. CHAPEL—What I have to say, is this: I am one of those who believe that the publication and distribution of all these matters at the expense of the public, are wrong. It has been my fortune heretofore to have been a constituent, and the public men of my county have usually sent me documents. Some days I received a number; in three or four days I received another lot. They are worthless. They cannot be kept on file. They merely fill up drawers as waste paper. What is the object of laying upon our tables a dozen journals, and paying the printers for printing, when more than a single number is of no benefit to us? Yet men get up and say that the practice ought to be continued. Sir, it is the practice of a few men to haw and gee, so as to try and make capital. The people at large are not benefited by it, and would remonstrate against it. I urge that those who are really in favor of reducing expenses, now come up to the scratch, and say that they will save money by reducing the number of those journals. I will go in favor of abolishing all that is extra in these journals. I don't believe that, except to know what A. B. and C. said upon some little subject, it will effect any good. I would rather go for printing 3,000 copies of the whole proceedings, and send them through the country; then we shall have something that will be laid upon the shelf for a reference; something that will be valuable for a future time. Then we shall have the worth of our money; but by the present system, money is spent, and we get nothing worth having.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I would inform the gentleman that I apprehend the object is, that the matter may be distributed among our constituents, that they may know what we are about. The gentleman wants some heart work. When we vote upon our per diem allowance we show our sincerity, and not when we refuse the prayers of our constituents for the pennies of a newspaper.

The gentleman says that he is willing to have two or three thousand copies printed when the whole proceedings are finished. Would that save any expense? Would not his constituents be better satisfied to learn his proceedings day by day? Would not the eyes of the constituents be more immediately upon their representatives? The gentleman from Calhoun tells us that the members will hereafter come here for forty days, and that the constituents will not have time to send an expression to their representatives; but sir, they will have an opportunity of keeping him at home, if they are dissatisfied with his vote. The object is to know whether they are properly represented, or are misrepresented. The people have called for reform. We have been sent here for the purpose of making great reform. They desire to know what we are engaged about. They want to know whether members are willing to vote for three dollars per day, and close their purses and the treasury when the question of a few documents to give to the people is presented.

Mr. N. PIERCE—As the gentleman from Oakland is so desirous of reform, he can pay the postage himself, out of his three dollars per diem, as he thinks two dollars enough. Fifty cents per day would effect the purpose; he would then have a balance of fifty cents in his favor. If the people of Oakland had been called upon to pay this tax of $1,800, would they have voted so to have spent the money?

We are all engaged in one object; yet we may have different views to effect it. He charges the Convention with being illiberal; talks about the pennies. If he chooses to pay the pennies out of his own pocket, this Convention will have no objection. I shall pay my postage myself, rather than have it taxed to my constituents, which cannot be sent to one in ten. It is impossible to send to one quarter of the people, and I think that the privilege of making a tax of two or three thousand dollars is wrong; and I hope that the report of the committee will be adopted, and that it will be carried.

The amendment of the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH] was lost.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY, and lost.

Mr. WOODMAN—Before the reading of the next section, I ask to make an explanation with regard to the proceedings of yesterday.

Leave being granted,

Mr. WOODMAN said—When I made the statement yesterday, and referred to one of my constituents, I did it with no unkindness to the gentleman, and with due deference to my friend and colleague.

It was not made from the impulse of the moment. I am intimately acquainted with Mr. Barrett, and I did not wish to do him injustice. But, inasmuch as Mr. Barrett has been quoted as authority; as my colleague has said that he has been instructed by the people of Oakland in favor of a reduction of the per diem allowance; and upon further inquiry the instructions from the people of Oakland resolve themselves into a letter from Mr. Barrett, and as I know the course which that gentleman has taken, I consider that it comes from a very questionable source. I referred to his past vote in the legislature of 1846; and after I had made the statement, Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH procured a copy of the journals and undertook to show that he voted for $2 per day. My object is to state the facts, that I shall not be looked upon as endeavoring to injure Mr. Barrett. The first that we find about Mr. Barrett's vote, is in the journal of the House, 1846, page 30, where in the case of a contested seat by Linus S. Gilbert, Mr. Barrett voted to give him two dollars per day. The question the following day, January 10th, recurring on the per diem allowance of members, Mr. Barrett did vote to strike out three dollars; but on the final passage of the bill we find his name in favor of three dollars per day. Gentlemen may turn to the 37th page, after he had voted to give Mr. Gilbert two dollars, and see when it came to his own pocket, he voted for three dollars, and so the bill was passed. I make these remarks to prevent myself from being placed in a false position, and I tender my thanks to the Convention for the opportunity of an explanation.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—In justice to myself, I feel bound to make an explanation, for I find that I am placed in a delicate position. During the discussion yesterday, a friend handed me a copy of the journal of '46. I barely looked at it; upon examining it more carefully I find that his previous votes were in favor of two dollars per day, his final vote was for three dollars per day. He found that his efforts were unavailing, and so he voted for three dollars per day. So, my colleague is correct, I am correct, and Mr. Barrett is superlatively correct.

Section 19. "The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in virtue of their offices, receive an additional compensation equal to one-third of the per diem allowance of the members; but the President pro tempore of the Senate shall receive no additional compensation except when the Lieutenant Governor shall not be paid for officiating as President of the Senate."

Mr. HASCALL moved to strike out all after "shall," in the first line, and insert the following: "receive no additional compensation in virtue of their offices."

Mr. H. said—Their labors are not more arduous; it may be said that they occupy a more dignified position; but I consider that the people of this State ought not to pay for dignity.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The pay of the presiding officers has been double the pay of the members; and while the committee thought that might be considered too much, yet they believed that some additional compensation might be proper. One reason was, that the presiding officer has very arduous duties to perform, that members generally know but little about. It is the duty of the presiding officer to see that the journals are made up properly; they are always reviewed by the presiding officer in the morning, to see that they are accurate and correct. To understand parliamentary law and the rules so as to preside with dignity and respectability over such a body, requires much study, observation and practice, and few have any knowledge of the time necessarily devoted to this task.

The committee thought that a double allowance was too much, so they adopted the practice of the State of New-York, and allowed him one-third more. It is well enough, although I have no great objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Kalamazoo.

If, however, this section is stricken out, the legislature may give a double allowance to the Lieut. Governor and the Speaker. It is a question whether, under the present constitution the legislature have a right to give any extra compensation to the presiding officer; but such has, I believe, been the invariable practice, and what the majority of a legislative body wish to do, they will usually do in some way or other.

The amendment was adopted.

Section 20:

"No member of the legislature shall receive any civil appointment within this State, or to the Senate of the United States from the Governor, the Governor and Senate, from the legislature, or any other State authority, during the term for which he shall have been elected, and all such appointments and all votes given for any such member for any such office or appointment shall be void; nor shall any member of the legislature be interested, either directly or indirectly, in any contract with the State, or any county thereof, authorized by any law passed during the time for which he shall have been elected, or during one year after the expiration thereof."

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND,

The 7th line of section 20 was stricken out, and the following inserted after "elected," in the sixth line: "and for one year thereafter."

Section 21 and 22 were read:

Sec. 23. Every law shall embrace but one object, which shall be expressed in its title, and no public act shall take effect or be in force until the expiration of ninety days from the end of the session at which the same may be passed, unless in case of emergency, the legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each house, shall otherwise direct.

Mr. BUSH moved to amend by striking out all before the word "which," and insert "no law shall embrace more than one subject."

Mr. B. said—I will briefly state my reasons for the substitute. I think that "no" is in better taste—more in accordance with the language of our legislation. A subject may be presented when the object is as far from it as the north is from the south. I want to have our Constitution so clear that it cannot be mistaken. A man may make a pretext—an object may be professed, when the subject may be very different. The subject should always bear upon its face the object. I think that the language of the amendment is better. It cannot be misunderstood. If it is, it is done so wickedly.

Mr. CRARY—Suppose the legislature should grant a charter for a railroad. A great variety of subjects might be embraced, but the law has but one object. The bill may refer to roads, the taking of lands; and if the present substitute were adopted you would have to pass fifty different laws, for it might embrace fifty different subjects.

Mr. BUSH—Some subjects of legislation may bring to our minds facts which it would be well to remember. I remember a law which was passed authorizing a company of men to grant policies of insurance. The object of the legislature was the insurance of property. The object of the company was to issue bills of credit—in fact to make a bank. I can enumerate many that were carried out with an entirely different purport. The object of a law may be very different from its subject. If the amendment prevails, that the law shall not embrace more than one subject, it will not be misunderstood, and I think, in the minds of those who make the law, the language could not be so construed as supposed by the gentleman from Calhoun.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I apprehend that neither the clause nor the amendment will reach the object aimed at. In the bill headed “appropriations,” clauses may be made appropriating money for public purposes. The general subject is appropriation. Therefore it has not been reached by the report of the committee or the amendment.

Mr. GOODWIN—The constitution of the State of Louisiana says: “Every law passed by the legislature shall comprise but one object, and shall be embraced by itself;” and I have been told that questions have arisen as to the validity of the general laws.

Mr. BUSH—I think that it is necessary for me to go to school and commence a system of education of the English language. I ask any learned gentleman here, to explain how we ought to express the subject of a law? The subject is the thing treated of; the object is the motive.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought the gentleman from Ingham [Mr. Bush] entirely right. “Object,” means the thing struck at—aimed at—the thing hit. “Subject,” means the thing controlled—brought under—embraced. The subject is one thing, the object another. Object embraces the motive and design, and oftentimes both the promoters and makers of laws have a very different object from what the title would propose. He believed that “subject” was the most definite and least liable to misconstruction, and conveyed the meaning which the chairman of the committee intended to convey.

Mr. BAGG suggested to amend by inserting, “nor shall embrace more than one object in the same subject.”

Mr. CRARY—If the proposition of the gentleman from Ingham is carried into effect, no future legislature can consolidate our laws. If the legislature order a revision, it will be utterly impossible for them to have it. The object is revision, but each law would have to be revised by itself.

The amendment was lost.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, section 23, line 1, was amended by striking out “every,” and inserting “no,” and by striking out “but,” and inserting “more than.”

Mr. BUSH moved to amend said section by striking out “object,” in first line, and inserting “subject.” But the committee refused to strike out.

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE, the words “in case of emergency,” in third line of section 23, were stricken out.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON, the words “all the members elected to,” were inserted at the end of third line of section 23.

Mr. HASCALL offered the following:

Amend section 25, 4th line, after the word “security,” by inserting as follows: “for the performance thereof, in the manner following; with such other conditions as shall be prescribed by law:

1. All printed matter except bills and resolutions shall be set solid, and as compact as the nature of the case will admit.

2. Bills and resolutions shall be done in the usual manner, and the price of composition shall be one-third that of solid matter.

3. Blank pages or fractions of pages shall not be computed in the estimate of composition, and no charge except for reading matter actually set shall be allowed.

4. No division of sheets or multiplication of signatures shall be permitted for the increasing of press work; and only the smallest amount of press work of which the nature of the particular kind of work is capable, shall be allowed.

5. All printed matter called for by the legislature shall be ordered by the token.

Mr. HASCALL said, that the object of this amendment was, that when a man entered into a contract with the State, to do the public printing, he should understand the manner in which the work was to be executed, in order that he might regulate his bid accordingly; and that he might conform to some specified standard in doing his work, and in making up his accounts therefor. The want of such specific provisions heretofore had left the door open for that wholesale system of plunder which had been practiced by our printers to the State since its organization.

By this amendment it is proposed in a great measure to prevent this hereafter.

The first clause provides that all printed matter except bills and resolutions shall be set solid. The object of this provision is to prevent the matter from being "*lead*ed," in printer's phrase—that is, that a thin strip of lead be put between the lines, in order to swell the matter out and make more "thousands," by which the printer gets pay for an extra quantity of matter. A frequent effect of this "leading," as members will see by reference to our journals, is to swell out what, if solid, would make but one page, and by that means make a fraction of another page. By printer's rules this fraction of a page, although there be no more than two lines upon it, counts just as much as if covered with solid reading matter; and I believe with our State printers the license is carried so far as to make the entire blank pages of our journals count, whether there be any reading matter on them or not. Hence they frequently get more pay for blank, than for printed matter. By the amendment every thousand ems charged to the State must be for actual reading matter set. Bills and resolutions are excepted by this clause, and are not required to be set solid. You will perceive that the lines are set much wider apart in these than in our journals. Thick strips of wood, called reglets, are placed between the lines, in order to allow the insertion of amendments. By the second clause, I propose to allow one-third the price of solid matter, for their composition; although there is not probably over one-quarter the amount of matter in them that there would be if solid, yet it requires some labor to insert the reglets.

To prevent charges against the State for the immense number of blank pages, which we every year see on our legislative journals, and which, on an average, equals, if they do not exceed the amount of actual matter set, I propose that no blank pages or fractions of pages shall be charged for. I venture to say that the State, as far as journals, bills and resolutions are concerned, has paid much more for blanks which have been counted as reading matter, than for reading matter itself. It is true that this clause comes in conflict with the general custom of printers. They have a rule by which they are entitled to count blank pages, when publishing a book, and where these pages are of rare occurrence; but I contend that it is altogether too liberal a construction of the rule, to count these blank pages in our journals, which are printed daily, and contain as much or more blank paper than printed matter. I believe no disinterested printer in the world would sanction this. I therefore propose to so alter the license of printers as to take away this privilege entirely, which when exercised justly and in the true spirit of its intent, does not much benefit the printer—and to say to the contractor, if he thinks this is going too far, he must increase his bid, before taking his contract, with reference to the prohibition. In no other way can this tremendous flood gate to the treasury be shut down.

The fourth clause provides "that no division of sheets or multiplication of signatures shall be permitted for the increasing of presswork; and only the smallest amount of presswork of which the nature of each particular kind of work is capable shall be allowed." The object of this is to prevent a practice which has prevailed among our State printers, of so dividing their sheets and arranging their matter in the forms, as to create what is called constructive presswork; by which double the actual amount of presswork done is charged for; thus securing for themselves twice the amount of compensation contemplated by the officers of the State when entering into the contract.

The fifth proposition is that "all printed matter called for by the legislature shall be ordered by the token." A token is 240 sheets, and only pay therefor can be charged; whereas, if 300 sheets were ordered, 480 would be charged for in consequence of the fraction over one token—that is, two tokens would be charged for. It is further proposed that the contractor, when he presents his account to the State for payment, shall make an affidavit that the work was performed and his charges made in accordance with the conditions of his contract; into which the restrictions proposed by this amendment will enter. My reasons for the whole action I have taken are, that those whose duty it may be to contract with printers, may not be deceived by an ignorance of their usages, and suffer themselves or the State to be imposed upon. Our past experience admonishes us that these guards are necessary; for no one evil has been more expensive and grievous to the State, than the advantages which have been taken by our public printers. By private individuals these licenses of the printers would not be suffered without legal resistance. But on the part of the State, they have been tolerated, because the burdens have been borne by the people at large, and no one man has thought it his duty to make any resistance. Another great good that will result by the adoption of this amendment, will be that it will improve the character of the work; inasmuch as these efforts of the printers to swell it out by leading, &c., will be prevented. It seems to me these objects are so important that they should be provided for in the Constitution, in order that it may be impossible for the legislature to be controlled by party or corrupt considerations, and at some future time break down the barriers here interposed between avarice and the treasury.

Pending the question,

On motion of Mr. GARDINER;

The committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to again. Leave was granted.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That from and after this day, the post master of this village be not authorized to charge to the Convention or State any postage on any mailable matter sent or mailed by members or officers of the Convention, and that the Secretary notify the post master accordingly.

Resolved, That from and after this date, there be printed for the use of the Convention but 240 copies of the journal.

Mr. STOREY offered the following as a substitute:

Whereas, The amount of Buncombe that has been expended by members of this Convention this morning, on the subject of postage, has cost the State more money than all the postage of members is likely to amount to; therefore,

Resolved, That the whole subject be dropped.

Mr. WHITE moved to adjourn; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to lay the resolution of Mr. HANSCOM on the table, which was lost.

The substitute offered by Mr. STOREY was not adopted.

The question recurring on the adoption of the first resolution, the same prevailed, yeas 81, nays 2.

The second resolution being under consideration, the same was adopted.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON,

The Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Mr. ROBERTS offered the following; which was not adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on supplies be instructed to direct the carpet on the floor of this Hall to be removed, and such arrangements made as they may deem conducive to health.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS,

Resolved, That the resolution authorizing subscription for newspapers, equal to two daily papers, be and the same is hereby rescinded, and the post master be requested to give notice to publishers to that effect.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND,

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on "Article —, Legislative Department," Mr. WELLS in the chair.

The question being on Mr. HASCALL's amendment,

Mr. ROBERTS offered the following substitute for section 25:

A State Printer shall be elected at the same time as State officers are to be chosen, and hold his office for a like period. He shall be a practical printer, and the prices to be paid him shall be fixed at forty cents for the composition of every thousand ems, and forty cents per white token for press work.

I am in favor [said Mr. R.] of the substitute from the fact, that in the several States where they have tried the contract system, and in Congress as well, it has proved a failure. In the States of New-York and Indiana, I recollect particularly, they have been obliged to fall back upon the printer elected by the legislature or the people. The trial that was given in this State for a short time proved a failure. In respect to the prices set forth, they are no more than reasonable, as can be ascertained by reference to any practical printer. And I am of the opinion that a practical printer is the most fit person to guard our printing, so that it will be properly done; and I do it because I would guard that useful fraternity against pettifoggers, pill pedlars and other quacks who become connected with the public press.

Mr. GARDINER—I have trespassed but little upon the time of this Convention, nor would I do so now, did I not feel a deep interest in the question before this Convention. This is a question which ought to be settled, and settled in such a way and manner, that there shall be no dodging; that we should leave nothing for future legislatures to debate upon; losing time and spending money, and at length, after all they do, or have done, get cheated at last. This question has been a bone of contention from the earliest period of our existence as a State, and even before that time. The debates and time consumed upon it have cost this State over $100,000. And yet I can see by the movements of this Convention that they are totally in the dark. After all the time and money spent, few of us know but little about it. When we were a Territory the printing was divided among the presses of Detroit. The legislative council paid $1.25 for every 1000 ems and $1.25 for every white token, and no outcry was made, because every paper received a slice. The legislative council afterwards gave their printing to one press; paid them 63 cents per 1000 ems and 63 cents per white token, and immediately every paper in the Territory was out upon them for being so basely cheated in the contract. From that time to this, it has been a bone of contention, until at last it is now reduced to 27 cents per 1000 ems and 27 cents per white token. And many say that it is not reduced enough, while I hazard the assertion, that if a printer does it for less than 40 cents each, he must purloin from the State to make it up. No printer can do work for the State, or any other person, for less than that sum and live by it. I appeal to my brethren in this house if this is not the fact. Yet the printing is done for 27 cents per 1000 ems and 27 cents per white token. It has been heralded forth that the people were making a great saving. The saving has been a few hundred dollars, wrung out of the printer, while members were putting in their pockets thousands. The legislature struck at the printers in the dark, and hit the public purse a great deal harder blow.

I have nothing to say about the system proposed by the gentleman from Kalamazoo. He has let down the bars, and I shall walk in. I am opposed to his resolution; for, notwithstanding all the guards, the door is still open, and it will be entered by whoever contracts for the State printing. He has told you that a blank page is paid for by the State. So it is; and so is the blank page upon the opposite side. Every journal is so charged, or it is not done according to rule. It is a rule of the craft; and I very much doubt whether you can alter it at the present time, as it has been a rule from time immemorial. But the door is still open, and printers will take advantage of it to make up for the difference in the contract price. They will take advantage of inexperienced men, even although they may be State officers, that will make up to him something equivalent to forty cents per one thousand ems, and forty cents per white token; and he must do this, or he cannot live. Now, a member cannot go into the country and get a pamphlet printed for less than forty cents; and the reason that the State of Michigan gets it done for less is, because the printer expects to make it up in some other way. I have examined none of the printing bills, but I know this to be the fact—that he must get that amount to be able to live.

I am in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from Chippewa, with one slight modification. That the legislature shall fix the compensation, and that it shall neither be increased or diminished during the term for which he is elected, and that a fair compensation shall be paid; thus doing away with the incentive to fraud.

The contract system has failed. The printers have resigned their contracts;—that is, they have thrown in petitions to be relieved from them. Now, to look at your own work, examine your own session laws, and see how the work is performed. I remember some six years ago, when my friend who is gone, had the printing at 17 cents per 1,000 ems, a package of laws was received, which I wished should be sent back to Detroit, as page after page could not be read; and you may depend that, if under the contract system, it is taken too low, but a few years will elapse before it will be thrown back, and the legislature will spend thousands of dollars in agitating the subject. Therefore, I want it settled by this Convention. Let the legislature have but little to do but pass the printers' bills and make appropriations. It has a bad effect. The people have been told you can get the printing done so and so; and so you can, if the means to which I have alluded are resorted to; but I would ask if it is better so to do, when we consider the frauds which must attend the contract system. It would pay the State of Michigan to employ a practical printer to audit the printer's accounts, if it cannot be got at any other way.

I am opposed to Mr. Hascall's resolutions on another ground: He says that bills and resolutions shall be done in the usual manner, and one-third the compensation for the price of solid matter, shall be paid for them. Here is the door wide open. Who among you can discriminate or compare the solid or open matter? How is it to be measured? How many thousands of ems are contained in the page? Are there five men here who can tell, except they are practical printers, or can tell any thing about it? Printers do not often come into a legislative hall. For many years there is not one to be found; and they are the only men who can tell whether a bill is correct. If the matter is not under the supervision of a practical printer, the legislature is liable at every step to be imposed upon, and does get imposed upon. I believe that the State of Michigan have paid for hundreds of thousands of ems and tokens which ought not to have been charged for; and these facts could readily be pointed out. But, what is gone by and paid for, it is idle to recall.

But, sir, I do want that no more frauds shall be committed upon the legislature and upon the State. I want the demagogical spirits shut out, so that it shall not excite the angry passions of the people. Who foots the bill? The people—the tax payers. They pay for the frauds and the expense of the excitement which is made. And I repeat, that I hope the Convention will settle the matter by a fixed system, and a fixed price. If the contract system is adopted, I believe that a few years will only elapse before we shall again be without rudder or anchor. Therefore, I hope this Convention will settle this matter at once and forever.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The committee endeavored to throw all the guards around it that they could; and if members will see to it, they will find that it is better protected than any other provision. The subject has been a good deal agitated, sometimes by one party and sometimes by the other. I remember the first time the contract system was pressed upon the legislature. I was in the legislature when the individual, to whom the gentleman from Washtenaw alludes, took the contract. He had not the means to do it well; and for that reason the contract failed on his hands. But I would ask has there been any one question more thoroughly discussed and decided by the people than this question of printing? For the last two or three years, I defy men to point out to me more than one or two of the public presses that were not in favor of the contract system. I will go further, and refer to the conventions in the different counties—to the convention at Jackson the last year. And I doubt whether there is a single resolution relating to the subject, that did not shadow forth the principle contained in this section.

You have all the people, all the public presses, and both political parties in favor of it. And can you hesitate? Is not our path clearly marked out, and ought we to swerve from it?

I have voted in the Legislature and in Congress to let the printing by contract, and was urged to do so by printers, and never have regretted my votes. It is said the contracts are not performed, and that the prices are too low. But why do they take these contracts for a less price than they can afford? Because they can get the Legislature and Congress to relieve them, by not enforcing the terms of the contract, and generally granting afterwards full compensation for what they had done under the contract.

I will refer to a well known case. The printing of the Senate and House of Representatives was to be diminished some 20 per cent. below the long established rates. That would have reduced the aggregate amount of printing some $50,000. On the very last night of the session, if I am not mistaken, the old price was restored, and the printers got for the printing every farthing they would have received at the old rates. It has worked well, with one exception in this State, and I believe if there are any practical printers in the Legislature, guards can be thrown around it so that frauds cannot be committed upon the authorities of the State.

Entrust it to such men as the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. GARDINER,] and the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL,] and the interests of the State would be perfectly safe.

Why cannot printing be let by contract as well as anything else? The Legislature can see whether the work is done properly; and if they would consult practical printers, there would be no difficulty whatever in ascertaining whether any deception has been practiced.

You require bonds to be given by the contractor, and in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, if the contract is found to be a hard one, the contractor comes forward and asks relief from the Legislature; and although sometimes delayed, the relief has generally been granted. Do as an individual would do—make him perform his contract. You might have some difficulty at first, but not afterwards.

Mr. HASCALL—The amendment of the gentleman from Chippewa, [Mr. ROBERTS,] merely contemplates a change in the section under discussion, so that the public printer may be elected by the people, instead of establishing the contract system. This does not at all interfere with the amendment offered by me, prescribing the manner in which the work shall be done, and regulating the mode of rendering an account therefor to the State. It is for the Convention to determine which system it will adopt; but in either case, I insist that my amendment ought to be sustained as a criterion by which the public printing shall hereafter be done, whether by contract, or by a State printer elected by the people. I have attempted to strike at those prominent abuses by which the State has heretofore been so grievously wronged and fleeced. Had the restrictions which this amendment throws around the public printer, been placed in the original constitution of this State, the people would be to-day one hundred thousand dollars better off.

I have no objections to the price which the gentleman from Chippewa [Mr. ROBERTS] prescribes. It is little enough if the work is done honestly and well. The old prices were fifty cents per thousand for composition, and the same price per token for presswork. Modern facilities, however, are so much improved, that these prices may be reduced to forty cents, and the printer still stand on as good footing, as under the old prices fifteen or twenty years ago. I agree with the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. GARDINER,] that at the prices which the present State Printer receives, he must steal to make a living. But I do not believe in the principle; and hence I wish to prescribe the manner in which the State work shall be done, and let the contractor, when he makes his bargain, look out that he puts his price at such a notch that he can save himself by it. If he will insist on taking it under price, he or his sureties must suffer the consequences; but I do not wish to see the State suffer, as heretofore, by the loose and miserable style of printing which our legislative journals and documents have constantly exhibited.

I know, sir, that human nature is weak. I am not prepared to say that if I should ever arrive at the honorable station of public printer to this State, which is not probable, and should find the door open, inviting me to the temptations which have surrounded those who have gone before, I should not imitate their example. However that may be, I am sure I should be none the less honest, for being encompassed by the provisions of the proposed amendment; and I am willing to believe the same of others. I do hope that the interests of the people may be consulted, and that this amendment may be made an unalterable part of the organic law of this State.

Mr. CORNELL—The principle of leaving the public printing to contract, single districts and biennial sessions, were well understood in public conventions throughout the country.

Mr. ROBERTS—The gentleman from Monroe having spoken of public opinion, I will merely say that I was a member of the State Convention at Jackson, last year, and was then in favor of the contract system, and remained so until convinced of my error by the experience of Indiana, Kentucky, Ohio, New York and Congress. I understand also, that it is about to fail in Illinois.

Mr. McCLELLAND—It is interwoven with the constitution.

Mr. ROBERTS—I mean that the contractors throw up their contracts. There is as much propriety in this matter, as electing a Governor, Secretary of State or other State officer. Why not let by contract the office of Governor and other State offices, upon the contract system? But, when you fix the price and elect a State Printer, there is an end to all further trouble. Here are the editors of the public presses who have been heretofore in favor of the contract system, now in favor of this measure. We are not here to act upon a mad dog principle for Buncombe, but we are to look to the future. We must look twenty or fifty years ahead, and look to the best interests of the people. I will not occupy the time of the committee; I am not well, and if I were, I never talk for Buncombe.

I look upon the entire article now before the committee, as made up en masse of humbuggery and Buncombeism.

A division was called for, and the substitute was lost.

Mr. HASCALL—I now renew my amendment.

A division was again called for, and the amendment carried with the following addition:

"6. All accounts for public printing shall be certified by the contractor to be in accordance with the conditions of his contract, and the same shall be made under oath."

Section 26 was stricken out.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following:

Add to section 27, as follows: "But the legislature shall provide by law for a simple and cheap method of selling, with the approbation of the judge of probate, the real estate of minors, and of married women whose husbands shall be incapable of selling the same."

Mr. LOVELL moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words, "with the approbation of the judge of probate."

Mr. BRITAIN said—Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ionia will not be made. The legislature find it necessary to pass a large number of laws at each session, to enable such persons as are named in the amendment sent to the chair by me, to sell real estate; and such laws have always contained the express condition that the sale can only be made with the approbation of the judge of probate.

These applications were made to the legislature, because the method of accomplishing the sale by applying to a court as now provided, was too expensive. That small amounts of real estate would be entirely absorbed in the process of application to the courts under the provisions of existing laws; and the several legislatures of this State have therefore considered themselves justified for going into this kind of local legislation to relieve this portion of the people.

I wish to relieve the people from the expense of going to the courts for relief, and the State from the expense of this local legislation. This bill proposes to save the State from such expense by prohibiting the legislature from granting such relief; while nothing is proposed by it to be done for this numerous class of petitioners. I hope the Convention will attend to the interests and rights of this class of our citizens, as well as to those of the State.

I have said thus much of the merits of the amendment proposed by myself, in the hope that the Convention would not, without due consideration, render it worthless by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ionia, [Mr. LOVELL.] And now, Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in relation to the amendment proposed. The amendment proposes to strike out from my proposition the words, "with the approbation of the judge of probate." Why this gentleman offers this amendment I am at a loss to determine. Can it be with a view to the improvement of my proposition? It would be no compliment, to him to believe it; and yet I am hardly willing to believe that he designs the destruction of the proposition by piece meal, and leave these meritorious applicants to the slow and expensive process of your courts. Is there any better person in the county than the judge of probate to superintend the sale of the real estate of minors? His whole time is devoted to the settlement of estates. Who can know more about the interests of minors than the judge of probate? But the gentleman does not propose to insert any other person as a guardian of the rights of the minor. Does he propose to have this sale take place without providing the guardianship of any one? And if any one, who would be as well qualified as the judge of probate? If you strike out as proposed by the gentleman, you leave the rights and interests of these applicants in jeopardy; and the proposition, if it ever became a law, would be with danger to those whom it is my design to aid. The amendment may not meet the views of the Convention, but I have offered it in good faith, and for the accomplishment of an important object, and I trust it will not be rejected without good cause can be shown for its rejection.

Mr. LOVELL—The Convention will do as they think proper, as I have no feeling on the subject. I believe, however, that it is improper to legislate here for private individuals, to enable them to sell real estate. I believe that there should be a law of the land to do away with the necessity, and then the individuals might make application to their own courts.

Many persons are in the habit of coming to the legislature for the purpose of avoiding expense. Great complaints are made of the time that the legislature sits from year to year, acting upon local subjects.

Our phraseology should be the assertion of general principles. I am not here as a legislator; and this conveys no fixed principle. So far from shedding light, it is a damage; for every surplus word introduced in this constitution needs some other word to explain it.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The object of the committee was to compel the legislature to pass general laws, giving authority to the judge of probate, or some other court. This does not deprive the legislature of the power of passing a law giving authority to the courts, for the object is to prevent the legislature from going into this kind of legislation. Your legislature have been much imposed upon. Your laws now are liberal with regard to this same subject. Your courts have now, I presume, all the power with regard to minors and in regard to married women, that most men suppose they should possess. But if they have not, let the legislature give them more power, by a general law.

But I am opposed to the amendment, as we do not know that we shall have a judge of probate at all. The legislature might see fit to give it to some other court. My opinion is, that it is best to leave the matter to the legislature. Deprive them of the power of passing any particular act, but not of the power of making a general law.

Mr. CROUSE—When interested persons can't get a judge of probate to sanction their wishes—to permit a sale—they come to the legislature and importune a committee until their ends are accomplished, to the great injury of heirs and minors. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. President: I am not yet able to find any argument against the proposition, in all that has been said against it.

The courts have been open to the people. Why have not the people availed themselves of their benefits? Because the expense was too great, and the general complaint is, that it would take all the property that minors had.

We have the interests of these persons in our keeping, and we may be assured that the public will always regard these interests with care, and I think the interest safe under my proposition, for I have never known relief granted by the legislature, except under the supervision of the judge of probate; and it has, so far as I am informed, always worked well when approved by him.

But if the convention strike out "with the approbation of the judge of probate," where shall we go for safety? As I have already said, who is better qualified than he? His entire time is devoted to probate business; or at least it is expected to be, and he certainly should be more capable than any person who has only an occasional case; and, Mr. President, he is the only proper person.

But the argument seems to run against the proposition itself. We are told that there is no necessity for my amendment, because the legislature will have the power to pass the general law without it; and the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] instead of pointing out a new remedy to the people, from whom he takes away an old, and the existing remedy, says not a word about it, but leaves them to obtain relief from courts, or to seek out the way in which they can induce the legislature to pass a general law. I do not wish to do so. If we take away from the people the safe, plain and simple method of obtaining relief, I wish to place before their eyes another way to obtain it, so that they may say to their representatives, "we expect you to pass this relief law before you return to your homes."

Mr. CROUSE—The gentleman says we take away the remedy. The people have the remedy, and the expense is only from five to eight dollars, while an act of the legislature costs $260. We are not robbing the people—we are only referring them back to the remedy.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. President: I have never known a sale accomplished through the courts for any such price. A single case may have been so obtained, where the attorney charged nothing—where there were but few heirs, and where there was not much advertising. But the gentleman did not say that it was a common price. But, Mr. President, information I have obtained elsewhere, places these expenses frequently at $25, and sometimes even above that price.

But the gentleman from Livingston annihilates us by the statement that an act of the legislature costs $260. The last legislature passed 346 acts. Placing their expenses at $50,000, each law would cost $15.

Mr. LOVELL'S amendment was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM,

The words "a simple and cheap" were stricken from the amendment.

The question then recurring upon Mr. BRITAIN'S amendment, as amended, the same was not adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

But the committee refused to rise.

On motion of Mr. KINGSLEY,

The words "or conveyance," was inserted in line one, after the word "sale."

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out the words "individual or individuals," and insert "person," in the second line.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND,

The amendment was amended by inserting "person or persons."

Mr. RAYNALE'S amendment was then adopted.

Mr. NEWBERRY offered the following as a substitute for section 28:

"The legislature shall have no power to appropriate money from the treasury to pay chaplains, or for any religious services performed in either house."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I trust, Mr. Chairman, the committee will indulge me a few moments while I briefly examine the reasons urged by the opponents of this measure to its adoption. With some, the appropriation of the public treasure for this purpose is considered unconstitutional, and hence they oppose the measure. We rejoice in their scrupulous regard for the constitution, and commend them for it. To such, permit me to say, as we are about to tear down the old fabric and rebuild, let us so construct it as to do away, forever, this objection. Let us place this matter upon a firm basis, beyond the reach of cavil, that the conscientious scruples of future legislatures may no longer deter them from doing what they would otherwise consider a privilege and a duty.

A few are so provident of the public treasure—so tender of their tax paying constituents, that they would by no means appropriate the money of the dear people for this purpose. They tell us the people are groaning under enormous taxes, and they are for reform. And can this measure be baptised with the name of reform? a measure which carries us back to the dark ages. Let me remind such gentlemen, "there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty." The silver and the gold are His, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. He openeth His hand and we are filled. He giveth us all things richly to enjoy; and shall we refuse to acknowledge Him? Shall we withhold the small pittance He demands at our hands?

Another class of objectors oppose us, as they say, from principle. They do not believe in audible prayer. They pray mentally—nay, they tell us they are good christians—quite devotional. But this praying right out, publicly acknowledging our dependence—unitedly seeking wisdom from above—this is too Pharisaical; they cannot—away with it. They forget the words of the Savior, “Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in Heaven; but whosoever denyeth me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in Heaven.”

But there is still another class of objectors, who urge with great pertinacity the abandonment of this practice. They say we compel them to listen to prayer in which they have no faith, and to which they are utterly opposed. Were the propositions assumed by these men true, did we compel them to listen to prayers which grate so harshly on their ears, I should sympathise with them, and enter the list in their favor; for upon this subject I am a latitudinarian; for giving the largest liberty to all for carrying out fully the provisions of the Constitution.

But how is this matter, sir? May not these men absent themselves from this hall until our devotional exercises are ended? Are they compelled to listen to our devotions? I think not. And how is it, sir, on the other hand? Have not the advocates of this measure just cause of complaint? Are not we cut off from a duty we consider desirable and obligatory upon us? Where, then, is the injustice, and who the injured party?

We believe in the divine revelation—we believe there is a God above and around us, who has spread out the heavens above us and garnished them; who governs in the armies above and among the children of men; who guides the destinies of states and of nations; who regards equally the prince and the peasant, the rich and the poor.

We believe we owe allegiance to Him; that He is entitled to the homage of our hearts and our lives; that we are bound to acknowledge Him in secret, in the social circle, and in the great congregation.

We believe He is the giver of all our mercies; the sovereign Disposer of all events, the great God, “who hath measured the waters in the hollow of His hand, and meted out the heavens with a span; who hath weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance. Behold the nations are as a drop of the bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance; behold, He taketh up the isles as a very little thing, and hangs the earth upon nothing; He poureth contempt upon princes and weakeneth the strength of the mighty; He increaseth the nations and destroyeth them; He enlargeth the nations and straiteneth them again.”

We reverence His authority and would obey His command to pray alway, with all prayer; mentally and vocally, on all occasions—when we enter on our private avocations or on our public duties—alone and in our associated capacities—at home and abroad—by the domestic fireside, and in the legislative hall.

And what do the opponents of this measure propose to do, sir? They propose to remove old and long established landmarks, which have for all parties stood as beacon lights along our political pathway; they propose to drive from our legislative halls, a long cherished and time honored custom, which has thrown a sacred halo around their deliberations, and dignified their proceedings. They propose to launch upon the broad sea of infidelity, and by their conduct say, “no God.” They propose to have the representatives of this free and enlightened commonwealth throw off moral restraint, and enter upon their duties without acknowledging God. And are we prepared to do it—will the delegates of this fair peninsula, of this enlightened State, in remodeling the organic law, throw the reins upon the neck of unsanctified ambition, and minister to those elements which have proved the ruin of all former republics? Shall we not be warned, sir, by the history of the past? Shall not the ghost of departed days warn us? Will not the fate of infatuated, infidel, revolutionary France admonish us? Shall we escape the vengeance of Almighty God? May we not expect to see our free institutions prostrated—our republican form of government demolished, and our streets deluged with blood? Are we prepared to retrograde in this age of progress and reform? Shall Michigan, which has proudly led in many of the reforms of the day, falter? Shall she hesitate? Shall she retrograde? No sir—no sir. As I look round upon this intelligent assembly, I read the ready response—No sir—No sir.

The progress of Michigan is onward and upward, destined to be among the first of the Confederacy; first in the beauty of her location; unequalled by any in the world; first in the richness of her soil and the verdure of her forests; first in mineral and intellectual wealth; holding a position in the councils of the nations second to no other State in the Union. No sir; Michigan is destined to progress; her course is onward. With LEWIS CASS for her polar star—with her moral, intellectual and physical prowess, she is destined to stand at the head of this Confederacy, and lead in those great moral reforms which are yet to redeem this world from the ruins of the fall, and reinvest it with all the beauty of Eden. And now, Mr. Chairman, how stands this matter, and who are the injured, the proscribed party, if this amendment prevails? Shall we, sir, have the broad seal of infidelity upon our organic law, and by our conduct say there is no God? Shall we not be in danger of advancing still another step—abrogate the Sabbath—pronounce death an eternal sleep, and the word of God a fable; and thus at one fell swoop destroy all that is fair and lovely, and of good report?

Take away moral restraint, sir—remove those safeguards which have been kindly thrown around society by the great law-giver, and the language of the poet is true—

Remove these kindly influences, and the hand of every man is against his brother, and this world becomes a scene of anarchy and of blood; an Acaldema; a field of blood, over which angels would weep, could tears be shed in heaven.

Let us remember, gentlemen of the committee, we act for posterity; let us so act as to secure their benedictions, and not their execrations. Let us ponder the warning of the immortal poet, uttered as he looked back upon the votaries of time, anxiously struggling for its airy phantoms:

“Day uttered speech to day, and night to night Taught knowledge. Silence had a tongue; the grave,

The darkness and the lonely night, had each
A tongue, that ever said—Man, think of God!
Think of thyself! Think of eternity!
Fear God! the thundersaid; fear God! the waves;
Fear God! the lightning of the storm replied;
Fear God! deep loudly answered back to deep.”

We are told in the word of inspiration, sir, “The fear of the Lord is the beginning of Wisdom.” Let us be wise; let us fear God; and, above all, let us fear to lay ruthless hands upon his institutions, trample upon his ordinances, and provoke his vengeance. I trust, sir, gentlemen will reflect before they cast their votes for this amendment, and that it will not prevail. The subject is one in which I, my constituents, and many members upon this floor, feel a deep interest; a subject in which the citizens of this State have a vital interest for all coming time; and I call upon gentlemen to reflect before they vote. I had hoped, sir, my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] would have accompanied his motion with some reasons for this innovation—this departure from a long cherished, a venerated custom. I hoped he would have told us why he considers it necessary to drive all devotional exercises from this hall. Why we should pour contempt upon this time honored custom.

The amendment of Mr. NEWBERRY was adopted.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, all after ‘title,’ in the first line of section 29, was stricken out, and the following inserted:

“Only, but the act revised, and section or sections of the act amended, shall be published at length.”

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD offered the following resolution:

Resolved That hereafter the afternoon sessions of this Convention shall commence at 2 o’clock, until otherwise ordered.

Mr. WHITE moved to strike out ‘two’ and insert ‘three’ in its stead.

Pending which, on motion of Mr. COOK, the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. CHURCH moved to reconsider the resolution passed this morning, relative to the printing of debates, &c.; which motion, on motion of Mr. HANSCOM, was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, (16th day,) June 20.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. MORRISON: of James Russell and 71 citizens of Calhoun county, praying that a clause be inserted in the Constitution prohibiting the legislature from enacting any law authorizing the sale of ardent spirits as a beverage. Also, of James Finch and 31 others, of the county of Calhoun for a like prohibition. Referred to the committee of the whole.

REPORTS.

Mr. COOK, from the committee on banking and other corporations, except municipal, reported back the following resolution, asking to be discharged from its further consideration, and recommending its reference to the committee on finance and taxation:

Resolved, That the committee on incorporations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing as follows:

1. That the credit of the State shall not be loaned to any person or persons, nor to any company or association, nor shall the state ever be liable for the stock of any corporation whatever.

The committee was discharged and the resolution so referred.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, reported

7. The stockholders of all corporations and joint stock associations shall be individually responsible for all debts contracted for labor performed for such corporation or association.

8. The legislature shall pass no bill altering or amending any act of incorporation heretofore granted, unless with the assent of two-thirds of the members elect to each House; nor shall any act of incorporation heretofore granted be renewed or extended. The provisions of this section shall not apply to municipal corporations.

9. The State shall not become subscriber to the stock of any corporation or joint stock association.

10. The property of no individual shall be taken by any corporation, other than municipal, for its own use, without compensation being first made or secured, in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

11. From and after the year 1880, the legislature shall have the power to alter or repeal the charters of all corporations whose charters shall not have expired previous to that time; and no corporation hereafter to be created shall ever endure for a longer time than thirty years, except those which are municipal.

Which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Sundry resolutions referred to the same committee, were reported back, from the consideration of which they were discharged.

Mr. CRARY, from the committee on the judicial department, reported the following article, which was read the first and second time:

Article — Judicial Department.

Sec. 1. The judicial power is vested in one supreme court, in circuit courts, in probate courts, and in justices of the peace. Inferior local courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction may be established by the legislature in cities.

Sec. 2. The supreme court shall consist of three judges, two of whom shall form a quorum, and the concurrence of two shall be necessary to every decision. A judge dissenting from a decision shall give the reasons for such dissent, in writing, under his own signature.

Sec. 3. The judges of the supreme court shall be elected by the qualified electors, and shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified.

Sec. 4. Of the judges of the supreme court first elected, one shall hold his office for two years, one for four years, and one for six years, to be determined by lot at the first session of the court after their election. Thereafter the judge elected to fill the office shall hold the same for the term of six years. The judge having the shortest time to serve shall be Chief Justice.

Sec. 5. The supreme court shall have a general superintending control over all inferior courts, and shall have power to issue writs of error, habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other original and remedial writs, and to hear and determine the same. In all other cases it shall have appellate jurisdiction only.

Sec. 6. The supreme court shall hold terms annually in each judicial circuit, at such time and place as may be designated by said court.

Sec. 7. The supreme court shall have power, by general rules, to establish, modify and amend the practice in said court and in the circuit courts.

Sec. 8. The State shall be divided into five judicial circuits; in each of which one circuit judge shall be elected by the qualified electors thereof, who shall hold his office for the term of six years, and until his successor is elected and qualified.

Sec. 9. The legislature may alter the limits of circuits or increase the number of the same; but no increase thereof shall be made except at the session of the legislature first held after the apportionment of senators and representatives provided for in this constitution. No alteration or increase shall have the effect to remove a judge from office. In every additional circuit established, the judge shall be elected, and his term of office shall continue as provided in this Constitution for judges of the circuit court.

Sec. 10. The circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction in all matters civil and criminal not excepted in this Constitution, and not prohibited by law, and appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts and tribunals, and a supervisory control of the same. They shall also have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari and other writs necessary to carry into effect their orders, judgments and decrees, and give them a general control over inferior courts and tribunals within their respective jurisdictions.

Sec. 11. Each of the judges of the supreme and circuit courts shall receive a salary, payable quarterly. They shall receive no fees or perquisites of office, or other compensation; and shall hold no other office of trust or profit during the term for which they are elected, and for one year thereafter. All votes for either of them for any office other than the one held by them, given either by the legislature or the people, shall be void.

Sec. 12. The judges of the supreme court may appoint a reporter of their decisions. The judges of the circuit courts within their respective jurisdiction, may fill vacancies in the office of county clerk and of prosecuting attorney. But no judge of the supreme court or of a circuit court, shall exercise any other power of appointment to public office.

Sec. 13. A circuit court shall be held at least once in each year, in every county organized for judicial purposes. In counties having a population of ——— inhabitants, by the last preceding enumeration provided for in this constitution, there shall be held not less than three terms of such court in each year. Judges of the circuit court may hold courts for each other, and shall do so when required by law.

Sec. 14. The clerk of each county organized for judicial purposes, shall be the clerk of the circuit court of such county, and of the supreme court when held within the same.

Sec. 15. Appeals and writs of error may be taken from the circuit court of any county to the supreme court held in the circuit which includes such county, or with the consent of parties in the cause, to the supreme court held in any other circuit.

Sec. 16. In each of the counties organized for judicial purposes, there shall be a court of probate. The judge of such court shall be elected by the qualified electors of the county in which he resides, and shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor is elected and qualified. The jurisdiction, powers and duties of such court shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. 17. When a vacancy occurs in the office of judge of the supreme court, circuit court, or probate court, such vacancy shall be filled by appointment of the governor, which shall continue until a successor is elected and qualified; and when elected, such successor shall hold his office the residue of the unexpired term.

Sec. 18. The supreme court, the circuit and probate courts of each county, shall be courts of record, and shall each have a common seal.

Sec. 19. The legislature may provide by law for the election of one or more persons in each organized county, who may be vested with judicial powers, not exceeding those of a judge of the circuit court at chambers. In counties having a population of less than twenty thousand inhabitants, by the last preceding enumeration provided for in this constitution, these powers shall be devolved upon the judge of probate.

Sec. 20. The legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws of a public nature, and of such judicial decisions as it may deem expedient. All laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person.

Sec. 21. There shall be four justices of the peace in each organized township. They shall be elected by the qualified electors of the township, and shall hold their offices for four years, and until their successors are elected and qualified. They shall have such criminal and civil jurisdiction, and perform such duties as may be prescribed by law. At their first election in any township, they shall be classified by law in such manner that one justice shall be elected annually in each township thereafter. The legislature may increase the number of justices in cities.

Sec. 22. Judges of the supreme court, circuit judges and justices of the peace, shall be conservators of the peace within their respective jurisdictions.

Sec. 23. The first election of judges of the supreme court, and judges of the circuit and probate court shall be held on the first Monday in April, 1851; and every two years thereafter an election shall be held for one judge of the supreme court, and every sixth year thereafter for judges of the circuit court, and every fourth year thereafter for judges of probate. Whenever an additional circuit is created, such provision may be made as to hold the subsequent election of such additional judge at the regular elections herein provided.

Sec. 24. The removal of a judge beyond the limits of the jurisdiction for which he was elected; or of a justice of the peace beyond the limits of the township in which he was elected, shall vacate his office.

Sec. 25. The style of all process shall be: "In the name of the people of the State of Michigan." All indictments shall conclude: "against the peace of the people of the State of Michigan."

Mr. CRARY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the article on the judicial department be recommitted to the judiciary committee with instructions that such committee so alter and modify their report as to provide that the judges of the circuit courts shall be judges of the supreme court.

Mr. C. said there was much diversity of opinion in regard to the judicial system to be established under the Constitution. The article which he had been instructed by the committee to report, went to establish one system, favored, perhaps, by a majority of the Convention; but as it had not been tested, he offered the resolution for the purpose of testing the question. If the Convention ratify the principle reported, there will be nothing more to be done. If they should not ratify it, the committee will have to go into further arrangements to perfect some other system.

The report and resolution were ordered to be printed and made the special order for Tuesday next.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved that the vote by which the resolution offered by Mr. ROBERTS, rescinding the resolution relative to newspapers, &c., be reconsidered, which prevailed, and the question being again on its adoption,

Mr. McC. would state that if this course had been adopted at the beginning of the session, he should have had no objection. He did not vote for the resolution, but to rescind it now would create some confusion.

He had understood the gentleman from Oakland to say, that the editors in Detroit offered to furnish the Convention with papers and look to the next legislature for being paid.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail. He had consulted with the editors of the Detroit papers, and they had made the proposition which the gentleman from Monroe had stated. That was all the agency he had had in the matter. No papers were ordered by the committee.

Mr. S. CLARK understood that but very few members had availed themselves of the resolution relative to newspapers. He had not himself directed any papers to be forwarded, yet members were receiving three Detroit papers daily. Somebody, he supposed, should pay for them. He would ask what arrangements had been made. He did not believe one-fifth of the members had ordered those papers.

Mr. McCLELLAND supposed the arrangement had been proposed by the editors of the papers. He had not ordered those sent to him, and he supposed the case was the same with other members. But (said Mr. McC.) if we receive them and say nothing to the Clerk, the presumption is that we have ordered them. If a paper comes to you through the mail, and you receive it, you are liable for the payment.

Mr. BRITAIN was opposed to the adoption of the first resolution authorizing papers to be ordered, because it was a practice which future Legislatures should not be countenanced in doing. The editors had been here and had made interest enough to get the resolution passed. He should not go for reconsideration, and did not expect to have any trouble with the publishers, as he should pay for the papers he received.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—There is one thing in the resolution which ought to be amended. It imposes on the postmaster the duty of notifying the publishers, which the Convention had no right to do.

Mr. ROBERTSON—It is the same notice which an individual would make to the postmaster, and which postmasters are directed by the general office to give when required.

The motion to reconsider prevailed.

The question recurring on its adoption, Mr. ALVORD moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Lost.

Mr. J. CLARK moved to strike out "postmaster" and insert "Secretary."

Mr. HANSCOM moved the indefinite postponement of the matter.

On which Mr. BRITAIN demanded the ayes and noes, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Anderson, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Alvarado Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, Conner, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Eastman, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Webster, White, Whittemore—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Axford, Bagg, Barnard, Britain, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Chapel, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Hasscall, Hathaway, Hixon, Leach, Lee, Moore, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, Skinner, Sturgis, Town, Van Valkenburg, Wait, Walker, Warden, Wells, Williams, Willard, Woodman, President—44.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD moved to take from the table the motion of Mr. Church, offered yesterday, to reconsider the resolution relative to printing the debates.

Which prevailed.

The question again recurring on its adoption,

Mr. BUTTERFIELD said the motion of his friend [Mr. CHURCH] was made for the purpose of giving an opportunity for members of the Convention to express their views on the resolution offered by Mr. ROBERTS, and supported by the chairman of the committee on printing, [Mr. GARDINER.] He understood that resolution had been adopted without consideration, and that it contemplated different action by the committee in relation to the printing and binding the debates from that which had previously been determined upon by the Convention.

The State Printer had proceeded under the direction of the Convention so far as to set up four forms, thirty-two pages; two of those forms had been printed and delivered, and one of those forms had been printed for binding. If he [Mr. B.] rightly understood the statement of the chairman of the committee on printing, it was this: that it was necessary that this resolution should be adopted, that the debates might be printed in smaller type; that with the type used at present, the debates would make an unwieldy volume, and perhaps two of them. If he had understood him correctly, there was no type here that would be proper, as proposed or indicated by the chairman of the committee on printing, and he [Mr. B.] understood there was no such type in the State. He also understood that there was a contract to print in the usual form. If this be the case (said Mr. B.) it will be seen at once that if the committee should take the course indicated by the chairman, it will be equal to printing this book, the entire matter, in a new form, and not under the contract with the State Printer. The State Printer could not bring here type of that kind without additional expense, and consequently would expect further remuneration.

With reference to the unwieldy volume, it is sufficient to say, in the present form used by the State Printer, the debates will not make a volume, in all probability, as large as the volume of debates of the Convention of the State of New York. We have not in our debates occupied more than six pages daily; but say our deliberations shall cover eight pages, it will require 105 days to make a volume as large as that of New York; and no gentleman supposes we shall continue in Convention that time. The chairman of the committee must have been mistaken as to the fact. The volume would not be so unwieldy in its present type as that gentleman had represented.

One form is struck off and must be paid for; all we shall gain will be a little finer print, and perhaps some improvement in the general execution of the volume. This would not be a sufficient offset against the additional expense. He hoped the resolution of yesterday would be rescinded, and the State Printer be allowed to go on with the work.

Mr. CRARY said he found, by reference to a resolution of the fifth of June, that the Convention adopted and the committee reported that this book should be printed in octavo form, with burgeois type and a certain kind of paper. He believed this was called the medium sheet. There were also, he understood, the royal octavo and the imperial octavo. It appears this is the medium sheet, a little shorter; it will make a book as wide but not as long as the full or regular sized medium sheet. He wished for more information on the subject.

Mr. STORY—It appears this is a short medium sheet; if printed on a sheet a little longer, it would be what the Convention want, the size of our public documents. It would make a good appearance, and be fit to put in our libraries. The paper for the book will be longer, the type the same.

Mr. CRARY—If what has been stated by the gentleman from Jackson is true, and we shall have a longer book, I shall go for continuing the printing under the present arrangement. I would inquire if this is printed with bourgeois type.

Mr. STOREY—It is one size larger.

Mr. CRARY—It may be the long primer which is used; he thought it could not be the bourgeois; but not being a printer he made the inquiry. Then (said Mr. C.) we are not having the book we ordered. He would further inquire why the long primer was used when the bourgeois type was ordered. He would wait for an answer, as the Convention was under a system of reform.

Mr. GARDINER—for the same reason that it was not printed in brevier—because there was none here.

Mr. CRARY—That is a satisfactory reason. Taking this as it is, I shall go for reconsideration, believing we shall save several hundred dollars to the State. As a spirit of economy had come over the Convention yesterday, it would be as well to keep it up to-day.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. ROBERTS offered as a substitute:

Resolved, That the printing of the debates of this Convention be dispensed with, and the reporters relieved from further attendance.

Which was negatived.

The question recurring on the adoption of the original resolution,

Mr. STOREY hoped the resolution would not be adopted. The debates would make a very respectable volume of some 800 or 900 pages. He saw no reason for altering the arrangement which had been made for printing.

Mr. GARDINER said he had spoken in favor of the adoption of the resolution yesterday, in accordance with the views of a large number of the members of the Convention who had expressed their dissatisfaction with the type and printing. He had supported it because he thought it was the wish of the Convention, and had made a fair statement of what the difference of expense would be; he had no objection to rescind the resolution and return to the old form of printing. He thought his friend from Jackson [Mr. STOREY] mistaken in his statement that the debates will not exceed some 800 pages. One of the reports had been shown to him, of over forty pages of closely written manuscript. It was desirable that the Convention should soon decide, as the printing was suspended. With regard to the printing, there was no bourgeois type here; the type used is that in which the State printing is done. There was no blame attached to the State printer. He was not aware that any other kind of printing would be required, or he would have provided for it, even at a sacrifice; and he [Mr. G.] believed it would be a sacrifice before the printer got through. It was very lean work in this type. Had arrangements been previously made, or could it be effected without much inconvenience, he should have preferred to have it done on brevier type; as it had been decided to send a copy into every State in the Union, and to the several departments of the United States government, he should have liked the work so gotten up for the credit of the State of Michigan and the craft.

The gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] had suggested the propriety of inserting the old constitution, the new constitution, the names of members, &c. The expense would be very little; but the committee had not been so instructed by the original resolution. The volume would be worth twice as much with that information. Without it the volume would be almost blank paper. Our debates here, are not much better.

Mr. HASCALL believed there were considerations that ought to induce the Convention to adopt the resolution. If order and economy were the order of the day, he had no doubt it would be an advantage to have the work done on brevier type. He believed if done in the present type, it could not be done in less than two volumes. It would require double the amount of paper and press work, and double the amount of binding. If the brevier type is obtained, it might be got up in a small, respectable sized volume. The paper which is now used is very expensive. There is something to be taken into account before the brevier type is ordered. The printer is not bound to print in brevier type, only in that heretofore used; that had better be settled upon consultation. In setting up again, the first form would be a small loss compared with the gain in the end. He hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. STOREY did not concur in the views of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL.] The Convention of New York sat four months and eight days. Their debates are generally printed in brevier type, with the old constitution and the new, and an ample index. It makes a volume of 900 pages. On the best calculation he could make, the debates printed in the present type, will make a respectably shaped volume of 800 pages.

Mr. CHURCH believed the type and the size of the book would correspond with the matter. He hoped no change would be made.

Mr. GARDINER had no feeling on the subject. The argument that the printing hereafter done will be at an increased expense, is wrong. The resolution is, that the State printer shall do the printing in such manner as we direct. They could have it done in nonpareil or any other type.

Mr. CRARY—Does the gentleman say the printer must do it?

Mr. GARDINER—If the State printer shall refuse or neglect to do the printing, the committee may get it done elsewhere at the same expense. It does away with the expense, except as to the first form. If this resolution is carried, they will not go on with the printing. In the brevier type it would save one-third of the paper and press work. If two volumes are to be bound instead of one, the expense will be increased. If the Convention sits sixty days, two volumes may be required.

Mr. McLEOD said he was utterly ignorant of the matter, utterly ignorant of the phraseology; but he thought he would add his mite to the obscurity, that the darkness might be felt. To postpone, he supposed, would leave the matter open for discussion to-morrow. To that he was opposed. It has been up from day to day, and has clung to the Convention like the old man on the back of Sinbad the sailor. He wished it were cast into the depths of the sea.

The gentleman says the printers are at a stand. The Convention is at a stand;—and we are all at a stand. That, [said Mr. McL.,] is the only fixed fact I have gathered, except the revelations of the gentlemen of the types, who tell us that we can do nothing to guard against the iniquities of the press.

Mr. CRARY said he believed if it was indefinitely postponed, it would leave the matter as before; and it could not be introduced again this session.

Mr. GARDINER—The effect will be, if it is postponed, to let the printers go on as before.

The question was taken on postponement, and carried.

Mr. CHURCH offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on printing be instructed to cause the following items to be inserted in the volume of printed debates, in their appropriate place and order:

1. The law providing for this Convention;
2. The present constitution and the new one to be presented to the people;
3. That part of the manual comprising the list of members, the rules and standing committees of the Convention.
4. The articles reported by the several committees;
5. The debates and an index of subjects.

Mr. ALVORD moved to amend by adding "but no speeches evidently made for Buncombe, shall be printed in the debates." Which was lost.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the resolution was amended by adding the following: "and that said committee be relieved from procuring the printing said reports in bourgeois type."

The resolution as amended was then adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered the following, which was lost:

Resolved, That on and after this day the Convention will hold but one session a day—that it will commence at 8 o'clock A. M.

On motion of Mr. S. CLARK, the special order of the day was postponed until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of Article —, "Legislative Department," Mr. WELLS in the chair.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out section 32, which provides that in case of contested elections, the person only shall receive per diem compensation or mileage who is declared by the house in which the contest takes place, to be entitled to a seat.

Mr. H said this appeared to be a harsh rule. It may be that a legislature may have paid persons who had no meritorious claim to a seat; but there may be cases of great doubt as to which of the claimants ought to receive his seat. A person may receive the official certificate of his election; another party may assume that the certifying officer has violated the law. Would it not be unjust to deprive the individual contesting, having a certificate, and compelled by every consideration of duty to his constituents to claim his seat, and refuse to pay him when acting in obedience to the injunction of law? This is a harsh rule. He would leave it to the legislature to act on the merits of each case. He did not believe the people would send members to the legislature so totally incompetent as to be unable to decide. They are not duties of the individual, but the people. It is their behests that may bring a contestant here.

Mr. BARTOW, of Genesee, said the true rule would be, to allow the successful contestant his pay, and the person having a certificate, his per diem, at any rate.

Mr. HANSCOM had no objection to see it stand in that form.

Mr. McCLELLAND thought some notice to the holder of a certificate should be required to be given, that his seat would be contested. If the certified person then comes on, and fails, he should not receive his pay. Cases have occurred where a person received his certificate by the fraud or error of the returning officer. Under such circumstances he comes here to get his per diem allowance and mileage. If notice were given, and no per diem or mileage allowed to the failing contestant, very few cases of the kind would be brought before the legislature for decision.

Mr. S. CLARK was of opinion that most of the cases of contested elections would be settled at home if it were not for the expectation, the certainty, in fact, that the failing contestant would receive his pay and mileage. The Convention had an example, a case of its own, that should settle the question. The member from Chippewa was here as a delegate without a certificate; his claim to the seat was so manifestly just that the certified person did not venture to come here. Could he have been assured of his mileage for coming here, it might have been an inducement so to do.

Mr. J. BARTOW thought the argument of the gentleman from Monroe [MR. McCLELLAND] was based on wrong principles. He says there may be fraud or error on the part of the returning officers, and therefore the person holding the certificate should not be allowed to come on and be compensated for his loss of time. Fraud or error may be committed without the holder of the certificate being concerned; and having the certificate it is his duty to come here under the order of his constituents; and any constitutional provision that shall deprive him from being paid for doing what he is required to by the law, would be wrong. The person who comes here and contests a seat without a certificate, and fails, should be cut off.

Mr. WALKER believed that in most cases of contested elections, the right would be found with those not holding the certificate. He had known cases where persons holding certificates admitted that they were not entitled to seats, yet those cases occupied considerable time in investigation in the House of Representatives, and before the committee on elections; and the parties received their per diem and mileage. A person not having a certificate will not be likely to come before a legislative body and claim a seat unless he believes he is entitled to it. On the other hand, a person having obtained a certificate comes in expectation of receiving his mileage and per diem until it is decided.

Mr. HANSCOM contended that the section ought to be struck out. The argument of the gentleman from Genesee [Mr. BARTOW] was the most correct. Gentlemen on the other side argued from isolated cases, which was not a correct course of reasoning. He, too, could state an isolated case which occurred last winter in the House of Representatives; the committee were divided in opinion, and a majority and a minority report were made. Mr. Ashman held the certificate; though losing his seat, he was sustained by nearly one-half the members of the House. Would it not have been hard, under such circumstances, to have allowed Mr. Ashman to go home without being paid? It would have been an act of injustice which the people will not allow. It is the people's right that is contested; they have an interest in it; the individual contests their rights. The gentleman from Monroe seems to think that every man contesting a seat consults only dollars and cents; that there is no patriotism beyond the per diem and ten cents a mile. Is it to be supposed that the Legislature in future times cannot decide rightly in cases of just claims and baseless claims? They have distinguished, and will distinguish such.

He [Mr. H.] did not believe there was in the constitution of any State a clause like this. He regarded it as an absolute, a downright absurdity.

We leave the Legislature to decide in all cases of contested elections. But there may be legal claims. In the case of a contested seat for the county of Saginaw, it was argued that the Legislature could not attach other counties to it for legislative purposes; questions of law were involved requiring the adjudication of our courts, on which the judges differed. In that case one of the contestants was sustained; as to the other, it would have been an act of great injustice to have turned him from our halls without being paid, when he came in good faith, sustained by his constituents, when they believed the law to be in his favor.

The argument of the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] is based upon the assumption that contestants are governed by mean and unworthy motives. He tells us that a man came to claim a seat without right, and that he so informed the committee on elections, and that there is apprehension of such fraud being again committed, and the Legislature endorsing such rascality. I (said Mr. H.) cannot go the length of that supposition. The gentleman from Macomb has been a member of the House and Senate so long that he may be supposed to speak of it from practice, but I disclaim it.

It would be manifestly unjust to allow a person to come here having the official signature of those who are by law authorized to judge, and when a majority may have great doubts respecting the claim, to send him home without being paid; the people having sent him here to claim his seat, to spend his time, and go to all necessary expense to sustain their interests.

Mr. CHAPEL hoped it would not be struck out, but amended so that justice may be done. But heretofore he knew the members from the upper peninsula have made it a regular business to contest their seats. He did not know that the distinguished member from Mackinaw had, but Mr. Ashman had been here year after year to contest the seat. The mileage is large, and the per diem allowance he obtains enables him to flourish as a very distinguished personage. It is wrong, and the inducements to such practices ought to be cut off. A certificate is given at the Sault before the returns come in from the other counties; he puts off with it; the other man waits till the returns come in, and puts off too; he of course gets his seat, as having had the greatest number of votes cast in the district. Ashman gets his mileage, some $250, and perhaps $100 for attendance. This amount he is able to put in his pocket under our constitution and the practice of the Legislature. He [Mr. C.] was of opinion that there was sufficient ability in the Convention to correct such abuse.

Mr. McCLELLAND would ask the gentleman from Oakland, who had represented the proposition as absurd, if the Legislature did not apportion the members amongst the counties of the State, and that the members shall receive a certain amount of pay and mileage; if you pay the contestant and the person having the certificate, does not the county obtain a double compensation at the expense of the other counties?

If the parties contest, he should have no objection to the insertion of a clause that the counties shall pay the expense. He believed the people of the State were in favor of each county being represented; but he thought it a hardship for those counties where there are no contests, to pay those counties where the contestants come from. You have no right to tax the counties of Wayne or Washtenaw, to pay double compensation to counties sending a double set of members. They come at the beginning of the session. The contest may not be concluded till the session is nearly over. Thus the county will have a member in pay in the House, and also a lobby member paid by the State, out of the House. Where a seat is contested, let the member who receives his seat be paid, and none other.

Mr. McLEOD said it seemed to him that the inferences which gentlemen were disposed to draw, were not deducible from the facts. If we strike out this section, we do not declare that the legislature shall pay the contestant. We only allow them to do so if it is compatible with the interests brought there by representation. The arguments of the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] would have been more appropriate when a member of the legislature, than in this place. Those who come from the people, representing the interests of the people, and acting under the solemnity of an oath, ought not to be deprived of the power to pay a contestant, if they think it proper and compatible with the interests of those they represent.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend by adding at the end of the section, "except in cases in which there shall be reasonable grounds to doubt as to the respective rights of the contestants."

Mr. W.—It might be said that the legislature have the right already; but we know that the precedents are all the other way. If it appears to the whole house that there is no just claim, and that the contestants ought not to be paid, precedents are immediately referred to, and the claim urged on that ground; especially when a man has a certificate. This would give notice to the parties that unless they had a reasonable claim, they would go without the expectation of any compensation.

Mr. GOODWIN said it appeared to him that the tendency of the whole debate was to show the propriety of leaving the whole matter to the legislature, to judge of the individual cases they may have before them. He [Mr. G.] would prefer leaving it to the legislature.

Mr. MOORE believed these things should be settled in the counties or districts where they arise. As it seemed to be the policy to correct every thing that was extravagant, he could not see the propriety of allowing persons to come here to contest seats. It should be competent for the people to say whom they wish to represent them. The legislature should provide that the will of the people of the county or district should be recognized, to cut off all those difficulties that have occurred in every legislature. Mr. M. said there was no impropriety in settling the question in counties.

Mr. FRALICK—The principal business of the Convention is to control expense.

This has been one of the grievances complained of—contestants coming without any reasonable expectation of getting their seats. Adopt this section, and there will not be so many claims for seats. Unless they have good reason they will not come. If the counties feel so much interest for the honors concerned, let them pay the defeated contestant. This crying evil has very much increased the indebtedness of the State, and it ought to be remedied. Place this section in the article, and it will close the door. It not only will have the effect of saving the mileage and per diem of claimants, but the time of the legislature, which has been often spent in investigating and deciding those questions. If a person has not a good claim, he will not come here at his own expense.

Mr. BUSH thought the section should remain. He would ask, if this is struck out and a blank left, how the legislature would be placed by the Convention? They would see by the reports that such a provision was introduced, and that after full discussion, it was struck out. So that they will pay contestants as before. Mr. B. referred to the case of Mr. Crane, of Eaton, in support of his views.

Mr. DANFORTH thought the amendment would be proper. He would not allow pay unless in those cases where there would be great and reasonable doubts in the minds of the contestants and the body who had to decide the question. Mr. D. referred to his own case, when his seat in the Senate was contested, and contended that in some cases it would be a mere act of justice to give compensation to the defeated contestant. He hoped the amendment would be adopted. If it were not, he should go for striking out the section.

Mr. ROBERTSON was in favor of retaining the provision. This had been a great evil, and ought to be provided against; not so much on account of the money paid to the contestant, as the time expended on those questions in the legislature.

Mr. SULLIVAN said—It appears to me that no power should be given to the legislature to allow compensation to unsuccessful applicants for seats in the legislature. There were undoubtedly cases in which the unsuccessful contestant had good reason to believe that he was entitled to his seat, and in which it would be a case of extreme hardship to refuse him compensation. The legislature, however, can provide for a decision of all such cases, by local tribunals. It is with such tribunals that the power can be most safely deposited. Entrusted to such hands, there is no danger that allowance will be made on the one hand to those whose claims are entirely unfounded, or on the other, that a just and liberal compensation will be refused to those who have expended time and money in vindication of claims believed by them to be just.

Mr. MORRISON had no objection to the original section, but he wished an amendment would be made to meet the case mentioned by the gentleman from Oakland.

The question was taken on Mr. WALKER's amendment, and lost.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend by inserting "from the State," after the word "receive," which prevailed.

Mr. HANSCOM'S motion to strike out was negatived.

The committee rose and reported progress.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on "Article —, Legislative Department," Mr. WELLS in the chair.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, all after the word "account," in section 34, was stricken out.

Sec. 36. The legislature shall meet on the first Monday in January next, and every two years thereafter, and at no other period, unless as provided by the constitution.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike out the word "January," and insert "February."

Mr. McC. said the first session was limited to sixty days. They would have to apportion the districts under the census of the United States. In case the Congress bill should not pass till near the close of the session, they may have to adjourn under the provisions of the constitution, and be called together again by the Governor. To avoid that inconvenience, he proposed the amendment.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to insert "the first Monday in June." It could not but be genial to meet at that time.

Which motion was lost.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out the word "Monday," and insert "Wednesday."

Mr. CRARY did not see any necessity for altering the time of the meeting of the legislature on account of the action of Congress. The census would be returned before that time. The law is fixed and the apportionment may be made as soon as they see the census.

Mr. McCLELLAND was aware of the law. The great difficulty is this: it is an act of Congress that may be repealed or modified as they see fit. Again: suppose there is a large fraction in the State; they may give a member for that fraction, or they may not. He [Mr. McC.] thought there was reason for the amendment.

The question being on Mr. RAYNALE'S amendment,

Mr. RAYNALE said he believed there was an obvious reason for the amendment he proposed. Some members have objections to traveling on the Sabbath. If Wednesday be fixed for the commencement of the session, most of the members in the lower peninsula can arrive here in two days. Another reason:—It is sometimes necessary to go into caucus for the nomination of officers; they will have more time for that purpose.

The amendment was adopted.

The motion to insert "February," was carried.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to insert "the first Wednesday in January, 1853, and every two years thereafter."

Mr. BRITAIN was of opinion that February would be better inserted as the regular time of meeting, instead of January. There was one reason in its favor: they might avoid much local legislation hereafter.

ter. Those applications for relief, and extension of time for the collection of taxes, would be got rid of. Members could arrange their winter business before they came, and they would have more of the legislation of Congress before them. As the sessions would be limited, they could get home in time to attend to their spring business.

Mr. REDFIELD would suggest another reason: At that time the treasury is replenished. In February and March the treasury is in better condition to meet the expense of legislation. January is always considered the worst month to meet calls of that kind.

Mr. J. CLARK hoped that it would be adopted. It would give the farming community time to dispose of their produce. It would be a better time for the legislature to meet. He moved to insert February instead of January.

The amendment of Mr. McCLELLAND, so amended, was adopted.

Sec. 37. The election of Senators and Representatives, pursuant to the provisions of this constitution, shall be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November, in the year 1851, and every two years thereafter.

Mr. McCLELLAND said the old provision was the first Monday in November. The alteration was proposed to meet the act of Congress; so that when the Presidential election comes round, there will be no necessity for a special election for President of the United States.

Mr. STOREY offered the following, to stand as section 38:

"All general laws shall be published in one newspaper in every county where there is a paper printed, which paper shall be designated by the Secretary of State; and the publisher of every such paper shall receive six cents per folio for such publication."

Mr. STOREY said—It has been complained of that the laws go into operation before being published. This would remedy it. The expense would be trivial compared with the advantage.

Mr. MORRISON—The difficulty will be obviated by the provision in the constitution, that no law shall go into operation for ninety days after its passage.

Mr. STOREY—This publication of the general laws would make the people better acquainted with them.

Mr. FRALICK—This is a measure that more properly belongs to the legislature. If the people want it, they will call for it.

Mr. HANSCOM said—The gentleman from Wayne, and others, had doubted the propriety of leaving any thing to the legislature. There appeared as much propriety in this, as in some of the proposed limitations. This applies to the people of the whole State, and is for their benefit. The paltry sum ought not to be considered in comparison with the advantages to the people of becoming acquainted with the laws. There is a necessity for the object being carried out; the very exigencies of the case require it. Unless there is a general publication of the laws, notaries public and justices will take acknowledgments of deeds in a wrong way, as they have heretofore done. It is time this evil under which the people have been laboring was removed, and a plan established for a more general publication of the laws as soon as passed by the legislature.

Mr. STOREY—This would merely cover the cost of composition. It would not pay the cost of printing; but they have an interest in publishing the laws.

Mr. HASCALL—The laws are published in the State paper, and circulated in every township of this State.

Mr. BAGG moved to strike out the words "six cents a folio." He should be sorry to see "six cents" in the constitution.

Mr. WITHERELL—Conveyances of deeds have failed for the want of knowing the change in the mode of acknowledging the deed. If the mode of acknowledging by a married woman is not in form of law, nothing is conveyed. The notaries public and justices of the peace do not take the State paper. When the change was made in the mode of acknowledging deeds, they did not, and could not know until it was too late.

Mr. W. did not hold the expense a matter of very great consequence, if the publication in this manner was necessary to enable the people to know what the laws are. If the laws were published in the papers in the several counties of this State, the people might be informed what the laws are, and not have to wait six months or a year, till the bound volume is published. He would ask what would be the probable cost of publication of the ordinary session laws of 200 pages?

Mr. STOREY—As near as I can estimate it would be about twenty-five cents for a statute page. The general laws would be but a small part.

Mr. LEACH—According to the statement made by the gentleman from Jackson, it would cost seventy-five or one hundred dollars for publication in each paper; an item worthy of some consideration. Whatever the opinions of the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] may be, I think it proper to look at the public treasury, and it might with great propriety be looked at by this Convention. If there were any necessity for this publication, I would be the last to oppose it; but I see no necessity for it. Ninety days are required after a law is passed before it goes into operation. This is enough—this is done now. The session laws of the last Legislature are ready for distribution. Besides, all those of a local nature, in which the people are interested, are published in the local papers. If there is anything in which the people of Jackson are interested, it is published in their paper—so in Genesee; besides this, there are laws which need not be published. Believing the publication of the laws as proposed by the gentleman from Jackson would be attended with much expense and very little benefit to the people, I am opposed to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GARDINER—The gentleman from Genesee is mistaken as to the expense; he also keeps out of sight the present expense of publishing the laws by the State. They are published by the State paper and sent to every township clerk in the State, and the State pays for it. Some eleven hundred dollars are paid to the State paper now for such publication. The publication of the general laws, as proposed by the resolution, will not cost so much as under the present arrangement. The idea that it is to be a great expense to the State is a mere bug-bear. The State is now paying more for the same thing and not getting it so well done either.

Mr. LEACH—I hope under the new constitution this expense will be saved.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE thought the laws passed the first week of the session would come into operation before they could be published, unless they were published in the papers.

Mr. WALKER had listened to a great many remarks from printers on the iniquity of the craft, and he began to feel a little suspicious. We are having our laws published in a newspaper, and they will not be finished before the session laws are published. It would be better to extend the time for the acts taking effect, and stop this newspaper publication. He hoped a clause prohibitory of such publication in the newspapers, would be inserted in the constitution, as Legislatures might not have such an exposition of the tricks of the trade as the Convention had had that morning.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—One word in defence of the press. My friend, Mr. STOREY, has not a cent's worth of property in any press in the State. As to publishing in the paper, it was supposed that by extending the time for the laws taking effect to ninety days, the laws might be got out in book form by that time; but such would not be the case. We do not live very remote from the capitol, and yet the laws do not reach us till November. They would take five months beyond the ordinary adjournment of the Legislature. The laws at present are published in the State paper, but they are not completed and furnished to the township clerks till late in the year. The publication of the laws at a small expense in the papers, would be a saving to the State and an advantage to the people.

Mr. WILLIAMS was opposed to this proposition. A few days ago we heard a great deal about expense. Grand juries were to be abolished because of the expense. And now, although the publication and dissemination of the laws are provided for, and although besides the annual statutes, the State paper is sent to the town clerks of each of seven or eight hundred towns, and an expense of $1600 perhaps incurred, yet it is now proposed to adopt another method of disseminating the general laws through the public press. And what will be the expense? Say there will be soon fifty counties and that it will cost $50 dollars each—the expense will be $2,500. But the worst feature of the proposition is that it is a bounty given by the Secretary of State to those presses in the interest of the majority. It must prove an encouragement merely to the party press of the party in the ascendancy. The minority are amenable to the laws, and to them a knowledge of the laws is as necessary as to the majority. He was unfortunately in the minority here, and in a small minority; but he conceived he was still entitled to an equal participation in the benefits of government. He regarded the plan, if carried out, as partial, radically wrong and unjust.

He thought the $2,500 could be expended where it would do the people more good. Yesterday we had an earnest debate on the pay of members of the Legislature. The whole difference between three dollars and two dollars per day would not vary much from $4,000. We had much better pay this $2,500 to the law makers. We had much better pay it to the judiciary, and thereby secure better judges. A good administration of justice is cheap at any price; a poor administration of justice is dear at any price. No, if we have any more bounties to grant, let us give them to those on whose decisions hang our lives and property. Let us pay this sum to either the makers or to the expounders of the laws, and not for so imperfect and partial publication of them.

Again, after hearing the exposition of the gentlemen from Kalamazoo and Washenaw, [Messrs. HASCALL and GARDINER,] he was afraid to have anything to do with printers. He was afraid to put his hand in the lion's jaw. For himself, as one citizen of the State, he heartily thanked those gentlemen for the fearless exposition they had made. It will save the State a hundred thousand dollars. If such an exposition had been made a dozen years ago, it would have saved the State a larger sum. These gentlemen, both practical printers, warn us that printers will cheat the State if the State has anything to do with them; and the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. BAGG] being the brother of a printer, proposes to open the way by striking out the price fixed in the proposition.

Mr. CRARY—It was in old times the custom to hang the laws up so high the people could not read them. It was the case in this State. It was to make the publication of the laws in one paper the authority, and every person who did not take that paper did not know what the laws were. For the last fifteen years the people have been virtually placed in that situation. The laws have been hung up so high they could not read them. We have been at great expense to provide men with the statute laws who ought to buy them. What is the course now? It is to send to the township clerk's office a State paper, and there the people must go to get a knowledge of the laws. I would go further; I would compel the Secretary of State to publish them in every paper of the State, not at the rates they have paid, but at what the printers will publish them for. The people may truly complain that they do not understand the laws—how can they when they cannot get at them. We have provided for publishing the laws, but not in a way to give light to the people. I care not about sending up a volume to the Governor's room; he can buy one; but thousands require information which can only be circulated through the papers in their locality. Give the people light; they complain that they have no light, that we have changed our laws so rapidly that they could never get at them.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Then amend the resolution by authorizing the publication in all the papers of the State.

Mr. CRARY—I am willing to do so, certainly.

Mr. BAGG was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Jackson. Those constitutional enactments should be simple propositions, and should not go into detail. He should be sorry to see six cents put in the constitution. Sir, (said Mr. B.) I came here to frame the warp; I did not come to put in the filling, red rags and everything, in the constitution.

Mr. GALE, from his experience as a township clerk, could say that the people never came to look at the State paper. Any person taking a good paper in the State would get all the laws that were necessary. The gentleman from Marshall complains that the people have not the information; but, sir, you may throw your session laws before justices of the peace, and they never look at them. The people will never look at the bearing of them. They will not take the trouble to see what the Legislature has done. The documents you throw amongst the people are scarcely ever taken out of the wrappers.

This was not a proposition to publish in all the papers; it would only go to the papers of the party, and would be a small gratuity to the party press. It was contrary to the restrictions proposed in the article on the Legislature relative to the legislative printing, which seemed to have been got up in a business like manner. It was going back again in reform, and he hoped it would not be sustained by the committee.

Mr. MORRISON—The argument in favor of this proposition is that the laws cannot be obtained by the people. If it be of so much importance to the community as represented, it appears to me that the resolution does not go far enough. If it is the duty of the State to pay for the circulation of the laws, let them pay for the whole community. The gentleman says they do not all of them take the papers; but those who do not may be the tax-paying part of community, and it would be unfair to tax them for the benefit of others. He would move to amend by adding: "and such paper shall be sent by the publishers to every inhabitant in the country in which the paper is published."

Mr. ROBERTSON would add, "gratis."

Mr. CHURCH would recommend the gentleman from Wayne to have the word "white" inserted between the words "every" and "individual."

Mr. STOREY had offered the section in perfectly good faith; and, notwithstanding the stampede got up, he thought it a good provision. He did not think any Legislature would enact more than one hundred pages of public laws, which amount was about twenty-five dollars to each paper, about five hundred dollars for the whole State; not so much as is paid for the publication at present to one individual. He [Mr. S.] had no interest in any printing establishment; the disclosures which the practical printers had made were not applicable to him.

Mr. WALKER believed if the present arrangement of printing the session laws in the State paper were discontinued, there would be no difficulty in getting the session laws printed, bound up and circulated within ninety days after the close of the session.

If so, he did not see any necessity for this gratuity to printers.

Mr. CRARY—After this distribution, so many thousand dollars paid, what is the benefit to the people? Where does it go to? To supply the office holders. There is not a copy to be obtained by the people, either for love or money. Nothing is done to supply the public with information. The gentleman from Genesee [Mr. GALE] says he does not read the laws sent to his office in the State paper.

Mr. GALE—I will correct the gentleman. I did not say that I did not read them, but that the people did not come to read them.

Mr. CRARY—I will correct myself. He says the people do not read them. His experience and mine do not agree. The newspaper taken into the country is read by the heads of families from the first to the third page; and I believe every person's observation will coincide with mine. The newspaper will be read, and the laws will be read in them. There is no occasion to confine it to the county or township clerk's office. Let the people know the law, and they will keep it. There are States that require the laws to be published in every paper of the State. A motion is made to amend, to publish in every paper.

Mr. N. PIERCE said—The gentleman should make it still broader, and send the paper to every family. Half of the people in the country do not take a paper. He did not feel willing to impose a tax of several cents on a person who did not choose to take a paper, for the benefit of others who did. It would not be fair. He did not think it would answer. There was a good paper, the "Educator," sent at the expense of the State to school districts. He knew they were piled up in the post offices, and sold for postage. I think [said Mr. P.] it is wrong—not carrying out the policy we began with. I do not think it will be the means of furnishing information, unless they send the paper to every man in the State, and pour it down on him, whether he will or not. I think the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] is not correct. I have gone with him, generally. But I think this is wrong. One-half of the people would have to be taxed for the benefit of the other half. The man that was willing to take the paper would tax his neighbor for publishing the laws. I think it wrong.

Mr. MORRISON—My amendment was to send it to every individual.

Mr. KINGSLEY—I am anxious to have this debate closed. I do not like any of it. The proposal of the gentleman from Jackson will not operate equally. We are in a majority now, but we may not be so always; and there are sometimes two democratic parties. Is it material that you send the laws among the people? I do not think it is so material. They don't care a copper about the laws. They will not read them—they do not want to have anything to do with the laws nor the laws with them.

If the people are so much in the dark, if they are suffering so much for want of this information, why do they not publish them in the papers as a matter of curiosity? Why do they hunt up steamboat disasters and all sorts of marvellous stories, to fill up their papers? Why not publish the laws? If every body wanted to see them, self interest would induce their publication. No sir; the people do not want to see them. Does any man read a law book for pleasure? No one reads it except he wants to use it. So far from being useful, it would kill our newspapers. Who reads the laws of the United States? Who looks at our session laws? None; except it may be a commissioner of highways, or a person in some little office, to see what his duty is. The people will not study the laws. You cannot make lawyers of every body. There is no use in bribing the papers to publish the laws. The people will not read them.

The motion of Mr. BAGG to strike out "six cents," was lost.

Mr. MORRISON's amendment was carried.

The question recurring on the proposition as amended,

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out all after the word "Secretary," which was lost; and

The proposition of Mr. STORER was negatived.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, section 36 was amended so as to read as follows:

"The legislature shall meet on the 1st Wednesday of February next, and on the 1st Wednesday of February in every 2d year thereafter, and at no other period, unless as provided by this Constitution."

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, all after "1851," in section 37. was stricken out, and the following inserted: "and on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November in every second year thereafter."

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; but the committee refused to rise.

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following, to stand as section 39:

"The legislature may authorize a compilation and reprint of the laws actually in force, whenever such reprint shall be necessary; but no revision or alteration of the laws shall at any time be authorized, except so far as shall be necessary to adapt them to amendments of the constitution."

MR. WILLIAMS was entirely opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.] It reads: "The legislature may authorize a compilation and reprint of the laws when it shall be necessary." Now, this was embarking on a sea on which he was not disposed to embark. "Compilation and reprint;"—that was exactly the plan out of which grew the last revision of the laws. The original proposition of the revisor was not to codify, but to compile the laws; the cost of which was to be five or six hundred dollars, and a corresponding expense for printing. But some how or other, the compilation and reprint grew into a revision. The pay of the revisor proved to be several thousand dollars, and the cost of printing, (including the cost of extra legislation,) he had understood, was $65,000; and the grand result was a mystification of the laws. Now he was against admitting any provision into the constitution that could in any event be perverted into a means of mischief. It might prove an entering wedge to another experiment of waste and extravagance.

Besides, after the expositions of the practical printers here, (he begged pardon for alluding to it again,) he was disposed to go against all prints and reprints, not absolutely necessary. If, as they tell us, the State cannot escape being cheated by the exercise of any possible ingenuity on the part of the legislature, or public agents, let us not afford a new chance for a misconstruction that may involve the State in a great and undefined expense for printing.

Mr. BRITAIN hoped the resolution would be printed, and the discussion delayed. The proposition before the committee did not interfere with this. He wished it to operate for all time to come. What do we do when we appoint a revisor? We appoint a man for some three months to do it; his revision does not suit the people, and the legislature cut it up; amend it again and again. That is why we have had so much extravagant legislation. That is why the people look on our laws with so much loathing as the gentleman from Washtenaw has said.

The gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. WILLIAMS,) seemed to misapprehend the object he had in view. He hoped the matter would lay over till to-morrow, when he would take the opportunity of stating his views more fully.

On motion of Mr. WOODMAN, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the following was added to the standing rules:

"A motion that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole upon the general order, shall always be in order, and shall be decided without debate."

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, (17th day,) June 21.

The President called the Convention to order at the usual hour.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. Merrill.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. ALVORD: of David Thomas and 185 others, inhabitants of the county of Genesee, praying that the right of suffrage may be extended to persons of color.

Also, of J. H. Sanford and 200 others, of Lapeer county; and of Wiley Bancroft and 74 others, of the county of Macomb, praying for a like provision.

Referred to the committee on the elective franchise.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. GRAHAM offered the following:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn on Monday, July 1st, the same shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, July 9th.

Mr. MOORE offered the following substitute for the resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention adjourn on Friday, the 28th inst, until Tuesday, 9th July.

Mr. CRARY moved to lay the resolution and the substitute on the table, but at the suggestion of several members, withdrew the motion.

Mr. MOORE said he offered his substitute because an adjournment was so much talked of, and he desired to have the question settled at once. Members were continually dropping off, under the impression that an adjournment would take place, and it would be better to decide now. They had been here some time, attentively engaged in their duties, shut up, and deprived of seeing their constituents. By taking a short recess, he thought members would return much refreshed, in better health, and fully prepared to perfect and speedily terminate their duties. Yet he was not strenuous in regard to his motion; if members would remain here and go on with their work, he was willing to remain.

Mr. WITHERELL said it was the custom, on the election of a Pope, for the Cardinals to assemble in secret conclave and conduct all their transactions with secrecy. The windows of the building in which they assembled were walled up, and no one was permitted to look in upon or listen to their proceedings. The situation of this Convention was somewhat similar to that of the Cardinals; although not literally walled up and sitting with closed doors, they were cut off, to a great extent, from communication with other parts of the State, and seldom had the privilege of meeting with any one of their constituents. In fact, the roads leading to the capital were so intolerable no one could be induced to come here unless urgent business made it necessary. Since his attendance in the Convention he had not seen any strangers or any of their constituents. He understood that five Indians and three squaws, from abroad, had been seen in Lansing within the past few weeks. He thought it necessary for members to see their constituents, and as they would not come here, their only alternative was to go to them. He was in favor of the proposition to adjourn, and as he preferred the Convention should sit where they could be in communication with the people, and see and know what was transpiring, moved to amend the substitute by adding, "then to meet at Marshall in the county of Calhoun."

Mr. COMSTOCK thought if an adjournment should be decided on, that Friday would be the proper day on which to adjourn. It would give members an opportunity of reaching home before the Sabbath, as there were those who would not travel on that day.

Mr. MORRISON said, as the amendment offered by the gentleman [Mr. WITHERELL] brought Marshall up, he would explain the situation of matters there. [Mr. M. then read a letter from the common council of the village of Marshall, tendering the use of a suitable hall to the Convention, should they think proper to meet in Marshall.]

Mr. HATHAWAY moved to lay the resolution and substitute on the table.

Mr. DANFORTH said he had in his possession a letter which would explain the move in regard to adjourning to Marshall. He would send it to the chair to be read.

Objection being made to the reading of the letter, Mr. D. recalled it.

The vote on the motion to lay on the table was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted yeas 40, nays 51.

Mr. BUSH moved the indefinite postponement of the resolution and substitute.

The yeas and nays were again demanded, and resulted yeas 45, nays 47.

Mr. WHITE said he was in favor of the original resolution, and opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. WITHERELL.] All must see the necessity of holding the sessions of the Convention at the Capitol, where they had access to the library, and could get any information they desired from the different departments.

Mr. MOORE did not expect or intend, when he offered his resolution to bring on any debate; it was merely to have the question of adjournment settled, and he wished members to vote considerably on the subject. Although he would be happy to visit and mingle with his constituents a short time, yet he was willing to remain if the Convention thought an adjournment improper at the present time.

Mr. S. CLARK said he would be glad to hear some good reason why an adjournment was necessary. His friend from Wayne [Mr. WITHERELL] had thrown no light on the matter, although he had discoursed quite eloquently about Cardinals, Popes, secret conclaves, and not meeting with his constituents.

He was opposed to an adjournment, and should vote against the several propositions. If the Convention adjourn, it would be two weeks, after meeting again, before they would be where they were this morning in their business. He hoped members would remain and go on with the business.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH did not know that he could give any good reason to the gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. CLARK] why an adjournment was proper at this time, yet he could give the reasons that were entirely satisfactory to himself. Gentlemen who had been in their seats during the month, and attended to the business of the Convention, were fatigued and needed some relaxation from their duties. He had been tired for two days. He thought the argument of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. WITHERELL,] that it was necessary to see their constituents, a powerful one. None of them were to be seen here; as for himself, he had not even seen the three squaws alluded to.

After an adjournment they would return invigorated and refreshed, and business must progress rapidly. The fourth of July, the great national jubilee, would be at hand during the approaching week, and as members would go off to unite in the celebrations, the attendance in Convention must be very sparse. In addition to this, farmers wished to go home for a short time to see about harvest and make the necessary arrangements.

These reasons he deemed sufficient why an adjournment should take place; nor did he perceive why gentlemen who were here with their families, should be opposed to it. He was in favor of the original resolution. On the Wednesday named for assembling again, the Convention would be full. He had no doubt but they would find all their constituents favorable to the adjournment. Such a measure might not be necessary for those who had been absent from the Hall during the sessions of the Convention, sitting in bar rooms and walking about the streets. But it was necessary for those members who had attended closely to their duties, and been in their seats all the time, like himself. He never frequented bar rooms, but attempted to discharge his duties faithfully by being in his seat at all hours during the sessions of the Convention.

Mr. KINGSLEY said this was an important move, and would stamp the character of the Convention by the manner in which the question was decided. What were the reasons given for an adjournment? He had heard none at all satisfactory to himself, or that he believed would be satisfactory to any one else. What would their constituents say? What reply would they make when asked by them why they had adjourned the Convention and come home? Would they say as the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH,] they were tired? There was no necessity for adjourning the Convention. Members were leaving for home all the time. Let them go. It was a usual practice, and no one would complain; but the Convention should not adjourn over. There was no precedent for it.

He was surprised to hear the proposition to meet at Marshall. He would ask the gentleman from Calhoun, if they think the Convention could be better accommodated at Marshall than here? Have they a convenient building and accommodations for so large a body of men to go amongst them on so short notice? It may be they have. He [Mr. K.] would be unwilling to ask the Convention to adjourn to Ann Arbor, as he knew they could not be accommodated there as well as here. But to adjourn because members are tired, is the most singular reason. It looks bad on paper, and will not pass current with our constituents. He was a farmer, and knew something about harvest time. Harvest would not commence before the re-assembling of the Convention, if it should adjourn, and he did not wish to go home and return before harvest. The plea of farmers wishing to be at home to attend to harvesting was therefore bad, as they must return before it commenced. They could yet spare twenty members, and have enough left to do all the business of the Convention. Let those who were compelled, go home, but do not adjourn. He should not know what to say to his constituents. He could not tell them he was tired. What would the whig papers say? Would they admit "tired," to be any reason for adjournment? They would ring from one end of the State to the other, and then they would learn what it was to be tired. Although they were in the woods, he was situated very comfortably. True, they were not as pleasantly situated as they would be in a city, but he was satisfied. He hoped they would not adjourn, unless better reasons were given than had been.

Again: It is urged by those who wish to adjourn, that the members of the Convention, many of them, wish to go home and see their constituents, and learn from them their opinions upon the novel subjects before us. That they want instructions how to act in the several matters introduced here. If the Convention adjourn for this reason, members will not gain their object. Our constituents do not know so much about the business before us as we do. Every man you meet will have an opinion of his own, differing from his neighbor and from our own. After an adjournment, if members consult their constituents, they will return to the Convention with more confused notions of the matters before us than they now have. Our constituents sent us here to make a constitution for them, because they thought we could make it better than they could; and they will make us responsible for our acts, however they may advise us in the premises.

Mr. DANFORTH would say to the gentleman from Detroit, [Mr. WITHERELL,] that he had lived here fourteen years. He was driven here by the force of circumstances; yet he had never regretted having made this place a home. The inhabitants of Lansing were an industrious, hard working and intelligent people, and he was happy to be numbered among them. Their population was at present over nine hundred, and the gentleman had been unfortunate to see only three squaws. He thought the gentleman ought to be contented to remain here among a population rapidly increasing; and one that would honor any community. Every nail driven was a penny for Detroit. The new counties should not be despised by those living in older and settled portions of the State.

[Mr. W. here stated that he had cast no reflections on the citizens of Lansing, or on the new counties. He had never intended or thought of such a thing.]

Mr. D. resuming, said he felt proud of his county, and could not rest under what he had considered at the moment, reflections on the inhabitants, without a reply. He thought he could explain all about the proposition to adjourn to Marshall, how it was gotten up, &c., as he had a letter giving a history of the matter. It was all gotten up under the management of Mr. Shearman, who had gone home for the purpose, as he was informed.

[At this point Mr. DANFORTH proposing to read a letter, he was requested not to do so, as the letter was a private one. Mr. D. then took his seat.]

Mr. CHAPEL wished to know if an amendment to the amendment was in order.

The PRESIDENT—Not at this time.

Mr. CHAPEL regretted that the forenoon should be spent in discussing these frivolous matters, that did not in any way pertain to the legitimate business of the Convention. The question under discussion was a matter that should not be considered for one instant. The people expected the Convention to be held in Lansing; members were elected knowing this to be the case, and it was idle to speak of adjourning to any other place. No sufficient reason had been given for an adjournment at all—there was none; and he was opposed to every such proposition before the Convention. If it should take place, the democracy would rise and pile anathemas on the head of every man who advocated the measure. Yes, every member of the Convention would be held to a strict account for such a proceeding.

What were the reasons given by the honorable gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH?] He [Mr. VAN V.] had gotten off an immense quantity of buncombe, but such stuff was not reason. The gentleman said he was tired. He [Mr. C.] was willing that all that class, the tired men, should leave the Convention and go home. If they wanted fresh air and recruiting, let them go; but he thought instead of returning recruited, and with a disposition to expedite the business of the Convention, they would come back with only a large accumulation of gas, to be spouted out for the edification of the other members.

He was opposed to an adjournment, and hoped the matter would be voted down.

Mr. HASCALL would inquire if there was not an insuperable objection to the proposition to adjourn to meet at Marshall? By the act "providing for the time, place and manner of holding the Convention," the State Printer was authorized to do the printing for the Convention, and he was now doing the work. He could not follow the Convention to Marshall, and carry the press, type, &c., necessary to carry on the printing of the Convention.

Mr. COMSTOCK said he had been edified by the discussion called out by the propositions before the Convention, yet he had no idea that the mover of the resolution intended to get up any debate when his proposition was sent to the chair. In regard to what the gentleman from Washenaw [Mr. KINGSLEY] had said in reference to farming, he would remark that he [Mr. C.] was a farmer, and thought this a proper time for farmers to go home and make the necessary arrangements about harvesting. None would be more suitable.

He was prepared now to vote on the question of adjournment, and hoped the Convention would settle it. He was opposed to the proposition to adjourn to meet at Marshall, but in favor of the original resolution.

Mr. MORRISON—The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. HASCALL] says there is an insuperable objection to adjourning to meet in Marshall, as the State Printer cannot follow us with the type, press and other articles necessary to do the printing, and that he is required to do the printing of the Convention. The clause of the act to which he referred reads as follows:

"And the State Printer shall perform the printing required to be done by said Convention, at such times and in such manner as they shall direct, and said printer shall receive the same compensation and in the same manner as is now provided by law for compensation and payment for legislative printing; and in case the said printer shall refuse or neglect to perform the duties as aforesaid, the said Convention may appoint a printer to perform said duties, who shall receive the same compensation and in the same manner as is now provided for legislative printing."

Now, sir, if the State Printer refuses or neglects to perform the duties, we can appoint a printer; and I fancy the Convention can easily get the printing done in Marshall.

One word in reference to the remark of the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. KINGSLEY,] that he would not invite the Convention to meet in Ann Arbor. The people of Marshall knew what they were about, and had considered the matter before extending the invitation. Marshall is situated in a central position, on the great thoroughfare across the State, and is a proper and convenient place for the Convention to sit. It contains a goodly number of intelligent inhabitants, a depot, telegraph office, and other necessary conveniences, and I have no doubt the people will be glad to meet us there.

It has been charged upon Mr. SHEARMAN by the gentleman from Ingham [Mr. DANFORTH] that he left here and went home for the purpose of getting up this movement. Now, sir, I doubt very much if the gentleman went home with any such view. He might, perhaps, have said to the people of Marshall that it would be well for them to invite the Convention there, but I cannot think he is liable to such charges as the gentleman prefers against him.

Mr. DANFORTH explained. He preferred no charges against Mr. SHEARMAN.

Mr. HANSCOM did not rise to inflict a speech on the Convention, but he would make a remark or two. He considered the proposition of the gentleman from Detroit [Mr. WITHERELL] to meet in Marshall, entirely wrong. It was actually necessary for the Convention to hold its sessions in Lansing.

In reference to what the gentleman from Washtenaw [Mr. KINGSLEY] had said about precedent, he would refer him to the action of the Convention in New York.

Mr. CRARY would be very happy, if the Convention desired it, to have it meet in Marshall after the adjournment, should it take place; but he wished it distinctly understood that it was no proposition of his; one with which he had nothing to do, and he should vote against it. He agreed with the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. KINGSLEY,] that the decision of the question would stamp the character of the Convention for stability, or the reverse. By remaining here, it would at least show they were doing something. Although he would be glad to accommodate members desiring an adjournment, he thought the effect would be bad, and must therefore vote against it. If they were reduced to seventy members they could go on with the business, and he was ready to go on until they found themselves without a quorum.

Mr. REDFIELD regretted very much the useless discussion that had grown out of the propositions sent to the chair; they embraced matters that could be decided in a moment. He thought the precedent quoted in favor of an adjournment a poor one. The Convention to revise the constitution in New York commenced their sessions in May, and were engaged in their duties two months before adjourning over, with little prospect of a speedy termination of their work. He hoped this Convention would go on with business, and adjourn finally at an early day. If it adjourned over for a week, two weeks must elapse before they would return here and be prepared to go on with business.

In the months of July and August, when the weather would probably be oppressive from excessive heat, members would actually require exemption from toil, and they should continue their labors in order to get through before that time. From accounts from different places it was possible the cholera might be here; and other considerations ought to induce members to go on and complete the constitution as speedily as possible. He regretted to hear the proposition of the gentleman from Detroit, [Mr. WITHERELL,] to meet in Marshall. As that gentleman [Mr. W.] had taken no part in the labors of the committees, he having refused to act with the committee on which he was appointed, he should be satisfied to remain here.

What could they say to the people when asked why they had adjourned? As yet the Convention had done nothing, and their constituents would ask in vain for the reasons of adjourning. No act [said Mr. R.] would stamp a greater stigma on the Convention than the adoption of the proposition; at all events, it would disparage them in the minds of the people.

Mr. WHITE wished simply to make a suggestion. The great national holiday was approaching, and every individual wished to enjoy the festivities. All the villages were making preparations to celebrate the day appropriately, and many members would be glad to go home and participate in them. That, he considered a sufficient reason for a short relaxation from business. As to precedent, they were numerous. Congress and other legislative bodies took a recess whenever any occasion demanded it.

Mr. N. PIERCE—As the Convention seem anxious to have a vote on the question, I will detain them only a short time with a few remarks. It seems to me, Mr. President, we should go on and get through the business we are sent here to do. There are some fifty farmers here, and the day of harvest is nigh; but I hope we shall get through by the eighteenth of July, or sooner.

As to the motion to adjourn and meet at Marshall, there I should be at home with my family, and among my friends and acquaintances; but in my view it would be wrong and not to the interest of the State. When we were elected, we were expected to sit here, where we can have the advantage of the library, and be near the State officers to get any information of them we may want. There are plenty of boarding houses here; we are all accommodated with good seats, and there is no reason why we should go away. It seems to me if any particular section was proper to adjourn to, it would be Detroit.

I am prepared, sir, to go on with our business and do it up now. I don't think there is any use for us to go to see our constituents. They would not give us any new light, and to go away would be to throw away our time. I hope we shall keep at work and finish our business very soon. I am very sorry the question has been agitated.

Mr. WITHERELL said he felt bound to make an explanation. He had been misunderstood by the gentleman from Ing-ham, [Mr. DANFORTH.] He [Mr. W.] had not spoken disrespectfully of the citizens of Lansing; what he did say was that people could not get here, and the Convention was comparatively shut up from other parts of the State.

He had not the least feeling against the place or the people. Every one who had traveled through the country must be satisfied with the respectability of the inhabitants.

[After some further remarks in the way of explanation, Mr. WITHERELL withdrew his amendment.]

Mr. WALKER offered the following amendment to the substitute proposed by Mr. MOORE, to come in at the end of the same: "and the members and officers of this Convention shall receive no compensation for the time that shall transpire between such adjournment and the re-assembling of the Convention."

Mr. BAGG had voted against every proposition to adjourn, and should continue to do so. There appeared, said Mr. B., to be two classes here in favor of adjourning over: the one wished to go home to see "Louise" and the babies; the other, to celebrate the fourth of July. He would be glad to see "Louise" and the baby, but intended to vote against adjourning. They had already gotten a smattering of the subjects before them and were now prepared to go on with business.

Mr. AXFORD moved the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. WELLS.

Mr. WELLS wished to ask two questions: first, if the Convention adjourned, what effect it would have with the whig party? Second, at what time a Washtenaw lawyer's harvest occurred?

The previous question was then renewed and demanded by the Convention, and the vote being on the amendment of Mr. WALKER, it was adopted.

The vote was then taken on the substitute of Mr. MOORE, as amended, and the substitute negatived.

The main question then being on the resolution offered by Mr. GRAHAM, the yeas and nays were demanded and resulted yeas 16, nays 73. So the resolution was not adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns on Monday, July 1st, the same shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, July 10th, and that the members and officers shall receive no compensation for the time of said adjournment.

Pending which, on motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of the article "Legislative Department," Mr. WELLS in the chair.

The question being upon Mr. BRITAIN'S proposed section, offered yesterday, to stand as section 39,

Mr. WITHERELL said he regarded the proposition a very singular one, as it actually prevented any alteration in the laws. It would make our laws as irrevocable as those of the Medes and Persians. He would be glad to hear some explanation.

Mr. McCLELLAND could not say that he was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien; some general provision of the kind might be proper, but he would suggest the propriety of referring the subject to a committee, otherwise it would be discussed here, and then before the committee also. It might be proper in some other place.

Mr. BRITAIN proposed to amend his proposition by striking out all after the word "authorized," and inserting "by the Legislature."

Mr. B. said he had no objection to withdrawing his proposed section, if this were not the proper place for it. He begged leave to say that his proposed section was not embraced in that previously referred to the committee, and unless this was an improper place it should be adopted.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend by inserting between the words "no" and "revision," the word "general."

Mr. McCLELLAND—I will not say this is not the proper place for the section proposed by the gentleman, but it strikes me it would be proper to refer the subject to a committee. It is a question of importance and should be referred. When the committee report, they can say where it properly belongs—whether in this, or the article on Miscellaneous Provisions.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE hoped the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] would accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.] There was an obvious propriety in referring the proposition to a committee.

Mr. S. CLARK stated that the subject had been before the judiciary committee, and was reported back and referred to the committee on the Schedule. He hoped that no revision would be authorized under less than ten or fifteen years.

Mr. BRITAIN said that all the remarks of the gentlemen placed him in a false position. The resolution to which the gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] had alluded, differed from the proposition before the committee; he begged leave to read it, as follows:

"Resolved, That the committee on the judicial department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that the legislature, at its first session after the adoption of the Constitution, shall appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to reduce to a written code, the whole body of the law of this State, or so much thereof as to them shall seem expedient."

The resolution merely instructed the committee on the judiciary to inquire into the expediency of authorizing some provision by the legislature to reduce the laws of the State to a written code—that is all. That committee reported the subject back to the Convention on the 17th inst., asking to be discharged from its further consideration, and recommending its reference to the committee on the schedule. It was so referred. My proposition embraces much more than the resolution and should be adopted whether that committee report favorably or not.

The gentleman last up, says he hopes no revision will be authorized under ten or fifteen years. I, sir, hope we shall not have one for fifty years—yes sir, not at all, unless there be some imperious necessity. When our laws have been amended to meet the wants of the people, I do not wish to see them altered or changed at the caprice of any one man or committee of revision.

Mr. Chairman: A revision of the laws should never be made, except so far as may be necessary to adapt them to amendments of the constitution. The laws in force at any time are better adapted to the wants of the people than any revision which can be produced by any committee of revision.

because they are the result of trial and correction. Whenever the people find a law to work badly, they petition the legislature for its amendment, and in this way, after a series of years, the laws became suited to the wants of the people. They are the result of experiment, and should not be exchanged for the effusions of any man's brain. No man could draw up a code suited to all the various wants of the people; and when the laws had by frequent amendment been made to meet those wants, all that should be done was, to codify and reprint the laws actually in force.

Michigan had suffered three inflictions of this kind since his acquaintance with her, and he had no hesitation in saying that they were among the greatest calamities by which she had been visited. The revision of 1838 cost the State, with the session which adopted them, about $90,000. It had the improvements of eight succeeding sessions of the legislature, costing about $50,000 per session; by which it will be seen that the laws in force in 1846, had cost the people of Michigan between four and five hundred thousand dollars; and yet these laws, having all the improvements suggested by the people during eight years, and which the people had adapted to their wants and interests at so great a cost—yes sir, these laws which cost the people half a million, were exchanged for what?—for the results of a few months' labor of one man's brain.

Mr. Chairman: It is this kind of exchange that I protest against, and which I want to prevent hereafter, if possible. Not, sir, that I question the high order of talent of the honorable gentleman charged with the revision. No sir; no person is more willing than I am to award to both him and the honorable gentleman who produced the revision of 1838, all that is so justly claimed for them. But, Mr. Chairman, this fact only forces upon me the conclusion, that no man, however towering may be his intellect, or however unbounded may be his attainments, can render the State a service at all commensurate with the value exchanged for it. Either the laws which were succeeded by the revision of 1846 were worth the half million which they cost, or the State has been unwise in employing the various legislatures to make them for her, and continues to be unwise in employing legislatures for similar purposes; and yet these laws, perfected by eight years labor and improvement of the people, at a cost of half a million of their money, were exchanged for a few months labor of one man. I repeat what I have already said: "no man can perform services for the State which can be worth to her any such price, as the sequel will demonstrate."

The revised statutes of 1846 came forth, an evidence it is true, of a profound intellect; but as no one man can know all the wants and interests of the whole people, it follows indisputably that no one man can draw up a statute so as to provide for all the wants and interests of the whole people; and this statute went from the hand of the revisor, the reflection of his own peculiar views, rather than those of the people.

The first embarrassment felt by the people arose from their utter ignorance of the new laws just published. The second resulted from the want of adaptation of those laws to their wants and interests; a general murmur of disapprobation ran through the State. The Legislatures were overwhelmed with petitions for amendments. The sessions were prolonged, voluminous session laws were produced, the treasury exhausted, taxes increased; and all this accumulation of evils, by a thoughtless or unscrupulous press, charged upon those Legislatures, which have perhaps been as faithful and industrious as any Michigan has ever had or can ever expect to have.

Mr. Chairman, these evils have not been produced by your Legislatures; they have been produced by your revisions! They will be produced by your revisions as often as your revisions are repeated. The Legislatures can neither prevent or avert them, and I trust we shall have no more of them.

If the laws are out of print, let us have a reprint of the laws actually in force, but do not let us have any more revisions. I should regret to see my proposition referred to the committee on the schedule, as they will be the last to report to the Convention. I wish to keep it by itself, independent, and not hung to anything else. I do not wish it reported here at the close of the Convention, and rushed through like an appropriation bill.

Loud cries of "question," "question."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I would suggest we are in committee of the whole and—

Mr. BRITAIN—The subject can be passed over at present.

Mr. CHURCH—The gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] is unwilling to have the proposition referred, and is determined to drive us to vote on the question when it is evident what will be its fate. Although it seems different from the resolution referred to the committee on the schedule, it covers the same ground.

Mr. BRITAIN—There is so much feeling on the subject, I withdraw my proposition. But I protest against the statement of gentlemen that this subject has been referred to any committee.

Mr. MORRISON offered the following, to stand as section 38:

"No appropriation of the public money shall be made for the publication of the laws of this State in any newspaper."

Mr. M. said his object in presenting the proposition was to avoid the difficulty that had heretofore arisen in reference to publishing the laws in the State paper. The Legislature had made such a provision, but he considered that no benefit was derived from it. The laws were published and bound, and ready to be distributed in book form long before they were all published in the State paper. If a necessity existed for publishing laws taking immediate effect, the Legislature could make some provision for publishing in bills, or some other mode. His object was to prevent drawing three or four thousand dollars from the treasury when no benefit was derived from it.

It was adopted.

Sec. 39. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act to grant any license for the sale of ardent spirits or other intoxicating liquors as a drink or beverage.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH offered the following as a substitute: "The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act to grant licenses for the sale of ardent spirits or intoxicating drinks, except for mechanical or medicinal purposes."

Cries of "question," "question."

Mr. Van V. said—I offer this substitute with great diffidence; with diffidence, not on account of the substitute itself, but for reason of the feeling which has manifested itself in the committee this morning—the disposition which has been expressed, to shut out debate and put down members upon this floor.

I have not made any estimate of the fate of the amendment I offer in this committee. I offer it because I believe many, if not a majority of my constituents, demand it at my hands. I offer it because it is a subject of vital interest, and the welfare of the community demands that something should be done by us, to stay the tide of misery consequent upon this unhallowed traffic. I represent in part, sir, the citizens of Oakland county, which in point of moral and intellectual worth, will compare favorably with any other county in the State. I am proud to represent the interests of such a constituency in this body, and can but regret they are not more ably represented. I have felt bound by their confidence to devote what of time and talent I possess, to their interests—to the best interests of the State. Thus far I have done so with untiring fidelity. I have been found at all times, and on all occasions, in my place during the sittings of this Convention. I have found no time to loiter about the streets or the public houses, when this Convention was in session. I have supposed the interests of my constituents demanded my attention here, and I have been in my place. When out of this house, I have endeavored to prepare myself that I might act intelligently when here, that my constituents might not suffer by my neglect.

It has been remarked, sir, by my friend from Cass, [Mr. REDFIELD,] that our constituents had sent us here as sensible, thinking men, to attend to important interests; and as I look over this Convention, I think they have not been mistaken. I am proud, sir, to be a member of this body, composed as it is, of character and intellect; it is with diffidence I occupy its time. I have listened with profound attention to all the debates upon this floor; to some indeed with more, and to others with less interest; and although many are much my juniors in years, I trust I have been profited by all. I have long since, Mr. Chairman, learned one lesson—the fallibility of poor human nature—the liability of man to err. I have often, in my own experience, found it necessary to throw by old cherished opinions, and adopt others. I am not a bigot. I am always open to conviction; ready to listen to the appeals of reason; and believe Solomon was right when he said, "the fool is wise in his own conceit." And still I know not, sir, that it will answer to quote from authority which appears to be so doubtful with some upon this floor; still, if they will, for this once, permit me to do so, I will listen patiently to quotations from their favorite authors, though they should be from Robinson Crusoe or Sinbad the Sailor.

I have said, sir, I was proud to be a member of this body. I am so. I have been treated with great courtesy by its members, and have formed acquaintances that will not be forgotten. I am proud to be associated with high minded, honorable men; and I regret that any one upon this floor would attempt to suppress debate, to interrupt members, and retard the business of the Convention. I ask you, gentlemen of the Convention, are you not entitled to be heard upon the subjects under discussion? Are you willing to be deprived of this right? Certainly not. Let us then extend to each other the courtesy of a patient hearing, that we may be benefitted by each others' observations and experience.

I submit it to you, gentlemen of the Convention, does it comport with the dignity of this body, is it kind, is it courteous, to attempt to cut off debate, to raise this senseless clamor of "question," when such men as my friend from Berrien are attempting to benefit us by their experience—men whose patriotism and purity of purpose no one questions?

Mr. CORNELL—I call the gentleman to order. He is not speaking on the question at all.

Cries of "go on," "go on," and "question," "question."

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—Much has been said this morning, sir, about the occupations of members upon this floor—that some claim to be farmers who are not so. I have said, sir, that I represent in part the citizens of Oakland county. I do so, sir—I represent the hard-fisted, toiling yeomanry of Oakland. The morning I left my home for this Convention, I doffed the farmer's frock and left the plow to contribute my mite to your deliberations and guard the interests of my constituents. I have occupied some of the time of this Convention, and when their interest demands, I shall do so again, and expect to be heard. Whoever thinks he can drive me from my purpose by the cry of "question," by a sneer or a laugh, has mistaken his man. I regard no such arguments. I spurn them; I spit upon them; they are the weapons of the coward and the knave, the ebullitions of ignorance and of folly. No high-minded honorable gentleman will resort to them. They pass by me as the idle wind which I regard not—they fall powerless at my feet. Now, sir, it may be said on this, as it has been said on a former occasion by some of my colleagues, that I misrepresent my constituents on this subject. I may misrepresent their immediate constituents. Sir, I have not the honor of an acquaintance with many of them; and upon this subject I take no issue with the gentlemen. Their constituents may demand at the hand of my colleague [Mr. RAYNALE] the appointment of a committee on Buncombe, and that my friend and colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] have it so amended as to include sermons. If I might venture an opinion, a committee upon the last subject might at least not injure their delegates. These gentlemen may correctly represent the views of their associates; but when they claim to represent the views of my constituents, I enter my protest. They have sent me here for other purposes, and expect other things at my hands; and in saying so, sir, I know whereof I affirm.

I have regretted to see anything in this Convention, sir, that savored of party politics; I was sorry to hear the word party named. Have we come here to promote party objects and party ends? I have not so learned my duty. We have been told the people have sent us here to do a great work; and, in the language of the prophet of old to the importunities of Sanballat and his associates, I would say, "we are doing a great work and cannot come down,"—cannot descend to the arena of party politics. I claim, sir, to be a democrat—born a democrat, I have never swerved from its faith; but upon this floor I know no party distinctions; in the language of one of our own patriots, "we are all federalists, we are all republicans;" or in the language of common parlance, "we are the people's men—having one object and one interest." While upon this subject, permit me, sir, to ask gentlemen of this committee if it is calculated to facilitate our business or add dignity to our body to be constantly talking about zuncombe? The facility with which some gentlemen bandy this term is good evidence they are familiar with the fabric. And the dexterity of my friend from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL,] forcibly reminds me of the old adage, "rogue first cries rogue," &c. Will gentlemen expose themselves to this imputation? Does any one believe there is a gentleman upon this floor who will sacrifice the interests of his constituents for the purpose of pleasing their ears? Any one who has come here for self-display? I, sir, should consider it a personal insult to have it charged upon any gentleman of this Convention, that he would so far disregard the high behests of his constituents, as to descend to a purpose so grovelling, so contemptible. I believe, sir, the members of this Convention have come here with good intents and honest purposes, and that they are not to be diverted from them. Let us, then, expunge this obnoxious word from the vocabulary of this Convention, treat each other with due respect, and prosecute diligently the great object before us.

Now, sir, I have said I offer this amendment with diffidence, and without any conjecture of its probable fate in this committee; but as I look around me upon this intelligent assembly—as I gaze upon the philanthropic countenances of my friends, hope is inspired, and I think I see here a pledge of the success of my amendment. What does this amendment propose, sir, and what are its objects? Does it propose to take away the rights of any man? Does it propose to trench upon the interests or character or happiness of any one? No, sir. It proposes to throw a shield between the oppressor and his victim—to protect the unfortunate inebriate from the cupidity of men who batten upon their substance, reckless of consequences—men who rob them of their character, blot out their intellect and degrade them to the brute. It proposes to cut loose our State from this cruel traffic—to wash our hands from all participation in this work of ruin and of death. It proposes to close forever these flood-gates of iniquity—to dry up these streams of sorrow and of woe. Adopt this amendment, sir, and it goes forth as a ministering angel to the deserted hearthstone of many a ruined family, reinvesting it with the rays of hope—bringing joy and comfort to the broken hearted. Adopt this amendment, sir, and you close up one of the most prolific fountains of wretchedness and misery which has ever cursed our race—you avert the progress of a destroyer who has strewed our land with the dead, and deluged our streets with blood. Who in this assembly has not witnessed the cry of the widow and the fatherless? Who have not suffered from the exactions of this cruel monster? Are there any upon this floor who are unwilling to put forth their efforts to redeem our state from this blighting curse—to drive the destroyer from our borders, and bind up the broken-hearted?

But I have trespassed too long upon your patience. Let us, gentlemen of the committee, adopt this substitute, and we shall do more to assuage human woe—more to decrease the burden of taxes—more to contribute to the happiness of our fellow men, than all the other amendments of the organic law can possibly effect.

Mr. BAGG hoped the substitute would not be adopted; he considered the section, as it stood, to be just what was wanted. It had been debated in the committee which reported it, and he knew only one member of that committee who opposed it; he heard one other was opposed to it, and that would be only two. A large majority of the committee were in favor of the section, and he believed it to be just what was called for by a large majority of inhabitants of the Peninsular State.

The traffic in ardent spirits was a relic of baronial vassalage that had been handed down and fastened upon the people, and it was time to break lose from the odious custom. It had been said by philosophers, that to unlearn his errors was the hardest thing for man to do; and it was as true in this age as in any other.

A British colonial governor of one of the Carolinas first entailed upon us the system of licensing the sale of liquor. An expedition, gotten up under his auspices against the Indians and French somewhere about Mobile, having signally failed, and his treasury being at a very low ebb, the system to license the sale of intoxicating spirits was resorted to to replenish it.

In regard to the license system, Mr. B. said he considered it unequal and unjust. Under it a capital of $2,000, invested in a stock of liquor, paid no more than a capital of $100. This was wrong. If a man was permitted to cram his liquor down the throats of people—to fill our jails with wretched paupers and send hundreds to a premature grave, he should be made to pay in proportion to his number of victims. He who kills only five by liquor, should not be made to pay as much as he who kills his hundred or thousand.

Mr. B. thought the measure embraced in the section was desired by a large majority of those who had been trying, by moral suasion, to advance the cause of temperance. They had done all that was in the power of man—all that could be done—but it was impossible to accomplish what they strove to do, while the Legislature, by its action, by the law of the land, gave a moral tone to the trade in whiskey. This entailment of Great Britain should be removed.

If [said Mr. B.] the sale of ardent spirits is an evil, why legalize it? If not, why not leave it alone, to be sold and traded in as any other article—as corn, wheat or any other commodity? If it were right to legalize the traffic in liquor, why not legalize houses of ill fame; for the support of ministers of the gospel? It could be done on the same principle, for it was no worse than to give a license to a man to murder with liquor.

If this section were stricken out, Mr. B. would propose another. All he desired was that the constitution should embrace some general principle. Could he go on and put in part after part, as he desired, to exterminate the use and sale of ardent spirits, he would do so; but this was a constitutional Convention and only some general principles could be embodied.

Mr. CHAPEL moved to amend the substitute as follows, to come in after "Legislature:" "shall have no power to pass any act, or grant any license to members of the Legislature to use intoxicating liquors as a drink or beverage, except for medicinal purposes."

Mr. GARDINER said—I do not rise to discuss the principles or merits of the proposition before the committee, although I yield to no one in zeal or fervor in the cause of temperance; but I must say I do not consider this the proper place for any provision this Convention may think proper to adopt on the subject. I believe, sir, if such propositions are embodied in the constitution, it will be endangered when passed upon by the people. This, the advocates and friends of temperance do not desire—they do not wish that the constitution, which has cost us much labor and expense to perfect, shall be risked on any such propositions. I believe I know the sentiments and feelings of the friends of temperance, and the different orders, and all they desire is to have a separate article submitted to the people, empowering the Legislature to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors.

The section reported by the committee does not contain all we desire. For this reason it will endanger the constitution, and I therefore move to strike out the section.

Mr. BAGG—The gentleman is opposed to the section, because it does not go far enough; he wishes, it appears, to prohibit entirely the sale and use of ardent spirits. I think, sir, I also know something about the feelings and wishes of the friends of temperance; and what they ask is that the State may cut loose from all responsibility—all participation in the system of licensing the sale of intoxicating drinks. They do not wish the State to give a moral tone to the traffic, to legalize it—and sir, they are too sensible to ask any thing more. The gentleman from Washtenaw [Mr. GARDINER] and other gentlemen here, wish to prohibit the use of liquor entirely, or to put it in the power of the legislature to do so. Sir, you may just as well attempt, in this Wolverine State, to stop the use of Java and Laguira coffee, of green and black tea—to stem the Falls of Niagara in a bark canoe—as to put a stop to the use of liquor.

Mr. FRALICK was a friend to the cause of temperance, and agreed with the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. GARDINER.] The friends of temperance did not wish the constitution endangered by any such provisions. They wished to place the traffic in ardent spirits on the same footing with other moral crimes. If the section were stricken out, the friends of the measure would draw up a proper clause to be inserted in a proper place.

Mr. LEACH said he did not believe the friends of temperance intended to attempt the prohibition of the use, or sale of ardent spirits, by incorporating in the constitution a provision to that effect. All they desired was, to have the State cut loose from the license system—to separate the State authority—the law making power—from any connection with it. The temperance men and friends of the cause were perfectly disgusted with the license laws. He thought the section as reported by the committee, a proper one. If the legislature thought proper to do so, they could pass prohibitory laws; it could be left to them.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following substitute for the whole matter:

"The legislature shall never pass any act authorizing or permitting the making or vending of ardent spirits, except for medicinal and mechanical purposes."

Mr. LEACH moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; but the committee refused to rise.

Mr. WITHERELL said it was well understood that without a prohibition, a person could go on and do as he pleased in regard to selling intoxicating liquors; and the true question was, whether he should do so or not. The proposition seemed to him void of any effect whatever. The men who sell liquor do not want any authority to do so; they have that right already; and the question was, whether the legislature should be authorized to prohibit that right. The power to grant the right, no one asked. The prohibition was what they asked.

Mr. EATON said if the license system were wrong, and an evil, the State ought not to countenance it in any manner whatever. He therefore moved to strike out of the section as reported by the committee, the words, "as a drink or beverage."

A MEMBER—I do not exactly understand the remarks of Mr. WITHERELL, as I did not hear them distinctly.

Mr. WITHERELL—I will explain. Suppose the gentleman is a farmer, and raises corn and rye. He has a natural right to sell it; or if he thinks proper, to distil it, and then sell. This is his right. He does not want a license to sell his liquor any more than he wants to sell his corn and rye. For this reason, the provisions under consideration are of no effect—a perfect nullity.

Suppose the proposition read, "the legislature shall have no power to pass any act to grant a license for the sale of horses." It would be of no effect, for it is a natural right, and without constitutional prohibition, will be exercised. In the section as reported, there is nothing on which to base even an implication of the right to prohibit the use or sale of liquors, and therefore I say, it, and the substitute, are a nullity.

Mr. WALKER—I think the committee and the Convention would be entirely mistaken in their duties, when attempting to define crime. The constitution should not specify whether the sale of ardent spirits shall be a crime or not. I have, sir, a proposition to offer at the proper time, as follows:

"The legislature shall have no power to impose any specific tax, fee or compensation, to be paid by any person or persons, except corporations, as a compensation for the privilege of exercising any moral employment or profession, nor to authorize or legalize, on any conditions, the exercise of any immoral profession or employment."

It mentions no particular subject, and embraces only general principles. The standard of right and wrong cannot be fixed for any specified time. It varied even under Divine dispensation. Noah, we are told, was fond of wine. The Apostle thought a little good "for the stomach's sake;" and it is used now at most communion tables.

I think, sir, we should only embrace general principles. We should not define the sale and use of ardent spirits to be a crime, nor should we authorize the Legislature to legalize any thing which the people at large think immoral. What may be considered proper now, may be deemed immoral hereafter; and what may be thought wrong in our day, may be esteemed proper in the next generation. It was at one time a common practice for the clergy to take, now and then, a little of the "crittur."

Creeds and tenets are continually changing—sects change. There is little now that existed forty years ago. We should only establish general principles.

Mr. HANSCOM—I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, to inflict a speech upon the committee, but for the purpose of calling the attention of gentlemen to the question. I had supposed that every gentleman who heard the remarks of my friend from Genesee, [Mr. LEACH], would have fully understood that the object, and the only object here designed, was, to sever the sovereignty of the State from any connection with the manufacture or traffic in ardent spirits—to no longer throw over this odious traffic the apparent sanction of law—leaving to the people and to future Legislatures of the State the power and duty to suppress, control or regulate the whole matter, as public opinion may dictate.

It was, sir, but a few moments ago that we were debating the propriety of an adjournment of this Convention, and one of the arguments used in favor of it was, that it would have a tendency to clear the intellects and invigorate our physical and mental faculties. After listening to the arguments of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. WITHERELL], who has been home and visited his constituents recently, it occurred to me that it had, in his case, induced a confusion of ideas that rendered it questionable whether we had not better remain until our labors were concluded; but fortunately for the friends and advocates of an adjournment, the gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] came to the rescue, and established most clearly the fact that there might be as complete and entire obfuscation and confusion of mind where one had remained here as when he had been away; so that between the two very honorable gentlemen, they left the question fairly balanced.

Mr. McLEOD said the proposition of his friend, the delegate from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG], was simple and intelligible; whilst the remarks of the other delegate from Wayne [Mr. WITHERELL] were very far from being so. It is true that Dr. BAGG's proposition would permit every body and any body to make and vend spirituous liquors; nor was it the intention of the mover to have it otherwise. He simply wishes that the State, as a State, should not be partakers of the wages of iniquity—should not derive a portion of its revenue from the tears and wretchedness of the victims of intemperance. It was simply the desire of Dr. BAGG to keep the skirts of the State clear from all the pollution, fancied or real, which grows out of intemperance in all its forms. It is a mere reversion to the principle of the Levitical law, which declares "thou shall not bring the price of a dog, or the hire of a whore into the congregation of the Lord." Deuteronomy 24, 14.

The motion of Mr. EATON to strike out "as a drink or beverage," was then lost.

The question recurring on Mr. CHAPPEL's amendment to the substitute of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, it was lost.

Mr. CHAPPEL then moved to amend Mr. HANSCOM's substitute by striking out "making and vending ardent spirits," and inserting "raising and selling corn." Which was not adopted.

The question then being upon Mr. HANSCOM's substitute, the same was not adopted.

Mr. DANFORTH moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. But the committee refused to rise.

The question then recurring upon Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH's substitute, the same was not adopted.

Mr. WALKER then offered his substitute for section 39: "The Legislature shall have no power to impose any specific tax, fee or compensation, to be paid by any person or persons, except corporations, as a compensation for the privilege of exercising any moral employment or profession, nor to authorize or legalize, on any conditions, the exercise of any immoral profession or employment." Which was not adopted.

Mr. GARDINER stated that he had made a motion to strike out section 39 some time previous.

The question was taken on the motion, and section 39 stricken out.

On motion of Mr. J. CLARK, the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE,

Resolved, That the use of this Hall be granted for the purpose of a temperance lecture, on Saturday evening of this week.

The Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on "Article —, Legislative Department," Mr. WELLS in the chair.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out the words "or any county thereof," in 5th and 6th lines of section 20.

After some debate as to whether the motion was in order—whether the committee, after having once passed a section, could go back and amend, except by unanimous consent, the question was taken on Mr. RAYNALE'S motion and lost.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the committee rose, and through their chairman reported the article back with sundry amendments, in which they asked the concurrence of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the article was laid upon the table, and ordered printed with the amendments made in committee.

Mr. AXFORD offered the following:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Convention, no member should be entitled to his per diem unless in actual attendance upon this Convention; sickness only excepted.

Resolved, That no appropriation be made for the purpose of paying any member of this Convention, his per diem, except for the time he shall be in actual attendance in this Convention; except prevented by sickness.

Mr. CRARY moved to lay the resolution on the table. Carried.

THIRD READING OF ARTICLES.

The articles entitled "Division of the Powers of Government," and "Impeachments and Removals from office," were severally read a third time and passed.

The Convention having arrived at the

SPECIAL ORDER,

Being the motion of Mr. WHIPPLE, made on the 17th inst., to amend section 16 of the article Bill of Rights, by adding after the word "contracts," the words "or effecting the vested rights of private persons, or retrospective in its operation;" and the same being under consideration, it was lost.

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend section 16 by inserting after the word "obligation," the words "or remedies."

Mr. F. said he wished to say a few words in reference to his amendment. It involved a question of great importance, and the Convention should decide whether the Legislature should have the power of changing the remedial laws of the State. He thought the exemption laws of 1842, which operated retrospectively, and the law passed afterwards, known as the "appraisal law," injured materially the interests and credit of the State. All knew the result of these laws, and knew the injury they had done. He hoped his amendment would prevail.

[After some debate on the question as to the constitutional right of the Legislature to pass exemption or relief laws, and allusion to the decisions of the courts in several of the States in cases involving the question, the ayes and noes were called for on the amendment of Mr. FRALICK, and it was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Axford, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Chapel, Cornell, Desnoyers, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Lee, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, N. Pierce, Raynale, Wait, Webster, Whipple, Williams, Withereil—26.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Carr, Choate, Church, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Crary, Danforth, Daniels, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Leach, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Town, Van Valkenburg, Walker, Warden, Wells, White, Whittemore Willard, Woodman, President—60.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, section 26 was stricken out.

Mr. MOORE offered the following, to stand as an additional section to the article:

"Any citizen of this State who may hereafter be engaged, either directly or indirectly, in a duel, either as principal or accessory before the fact, shall forever be disqualified from holding any office under the constitution and laws of this State."

Mr. M. remarked that he understood the report of another committee would embrace a provision similar to this; but he thought the proper place for the subject was in the Bill of Rights.

Mr. WITHERELL was in favor of the proposition, although few duels occurred in the State. It would show that public opinion was against duelling.

Mr. CHURCH thought such a provision would be ineffectual—violated whenever persons chose to do so. It was going a great way to embody it in the constitution. Whenever it became necessary to brand the duellist; the legislature could pass a law doing so.

Mr. WHITTEMORE moved to amend the proposed section by adding thereto the words, "nor be permitted to vote at any election."

Which was carried.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped the proposition would not be engrafted in the constitution. He had never heard of a duel fought in this State. Last winter there was some talk that "Uncle Jake" would challenge some gentleman, but it all turned out mere waste paper. There was not the least necessity for the section.

Mr. WOODMAN begged leave to correct his colleague, [Mr. HANSCOM.] Mr. W. was once in Detroit when a duel was fought by parties who came over the river from Canada.

The vote was taken on the proposition of Mr. MOORE, and the section adopted.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend section 30, by adding thereto the words, "and shall be appropriated exclusively to the support of primary schools."

Which was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend section 29, by inserting after "corporation," the words "except for educational purposes."

Mr. W. said his object in introducing the amendment was, to except literary institutions from the restrictions contained in the section. There were several of these institutions that held tracts of wild land, and it might be impossible to dispose of them within the time limited, unless at a great loss.

Mr. BRITAIN hoped the Convention would not consent to the proposed amendment. There was such a thing as Mortmain, and it was shingled over all the countries of Europe.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. RAYNALE submitted the following as a substitute for section 22:

"Involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crime, shall never be tolerated in this State."

Mr. R. said his object was to get rid of the word "slavery." It was a grating word, and his substitute covered the whole ground.

The substitute was lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend section 10, by striking out all after the word "defence."

Mr. R. said the words proposed to be stricken out were but a repetition of a right guaranteed in a previous clause.

The amendment prevailed:

Mr. WALKER offered the following as a substitute for section 3:

"No man or set of men are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services."

Mr. W. said he thought the section reported by the committee, and as it stood, an absurdity. It was clipped from the constitution of Virginia; but there was no meaning in it in this latitude, standing alone as it did.

The substitute was lost.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out section 7, and insert the following:

"Any person may publish his sentiments on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; and in all prosecutions for libel, the truth, unless published from malicious motives, shall be sufficient defence to the person charged, and the jury shall be judges of the law and the fact."

A division of the question being had, the motion to strike out the section did not prevail.

Mr. S. CLARK moved to amend section 10, by adding thereto the following:

"Nor shall any person be held to answer for a criminal offence, unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases of impeachment, or in cases cognizable by justices of the peace, or arising in the army or militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Pending which, on motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, (18th day,) June 22.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY.

REPORTS.

Mr. WHITEMORE, from the committee on the Elective Franchise, reported back sundry petitions and resolutions referred to them, from the further consideration of which they asked to be discharged.

Mr. WHITEMORE, from the same committee, reported the following article, accompanied by a resolution, the passage of which was recommended.

Article —. Elections.

1. In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State six months next preceding an election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant who was permitted to vote under the provisions of the previous constitution of this State, and their male descendants of the age aforesaid, having resided in the State six months next preceding an election, shall have the right of voting as aforesaid; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote except in the township or ward of which he is an actual resident, and in which he has resided for ten days next preceding the day of election.

2. All votes shall be given by ballot, except for such township officers as may, by law, be directed to be otherwise chosen.

3. Electors shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at election, and in going to and returning from the same.

4. No elector shall be obliged to do militia duty on the day of election, except in time of war or public danger.

5. For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the service of the United States or of this State; nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this State or of the United States, or of the high seas; nor while a student of any seminary of learning; nor while kept at any alms-house or other asylum at public expense; nor while confined in any public prison.

6. Laws may be passed excluding from the right of suffrage, and from holding any office under the laws of this State, all per-

RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That at the next general election, at the same time when the votes of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of the revised constitution, the additional amendment in the words following: "Colored male citizens possessing the qualifications required by the first section of the second article of the constitution, shall have the right to vote for all officers that now are, or may hereafter be, elective by the people, after the day of one thousand eight hundred and ," shall be separately submitted to the electors of this State for their adoption or rejection, in form following, to wit:

A separate ballot may be given by every person having the right to vote for the revised constitution, to be deposited in a separate box. Upon the ballots given for the adoption of the said separate amendment shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? Yes;" and upon all ballots given against the adoption of the said separate amendment, in like manner, the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? No." And on such ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed the words "Constitution: Suffrage," in such manner that such words shall appear on the outer side of such ballot when folded. If, at said election, a majority of all the votes given for and against the said separate amendment shall contain the words "Equal suffrage to colored persons? Yes," then the said separate amendment, after the day of one thousand eight hundred and , shall be a separate section of article second of the constitution, in full force and effect: anything in the constitution to the contrary notwithstanding.

The article was read a first and second time by its title, and, with the resolution, referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to take from the table the resolutions offered by Mr. AXFORD yesterday, relative to the absence and per diem of members.

The motion was lost.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. HANSCOM, relative to an adjournment from the 1st of July to the 10th, being under consideration,

Mr. CHAPEL moved to amend the same by striking out "Wednesday, July 10th," and inserting in its stead "1st day of October next."

When, on motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the resolution was laid on the table.

The Convention having reached the order of

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

The same being the Bill of Rights, the question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. S. CLARK, to section 10, as follows:

Add thereto the words "nor shall any person be held to answer for a criminal offence unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases of impeachment, or in cases cognizable by justices of the peace, or arising in the army or militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Mr. S. CLARK—When I made a motion to amend section 10 of the Bill of Rights, a section which I deem necessary to protect the rights of every person in the community, I did not expect so extended a discussion. But the time that we have thus spent, has not been unprofitably so. It is a question of great importance, as much as any that has or can be presented for our deliberation. If the necessity of a grand jury has ceased, if instead of being a shield and protection, it has become an instrument by which every citizen may be oppressed, it should be known, by public discussion, so that the people may call for its abolition. I was not aware until I came here, that there was any expression of public opinion in reference to this subject. Having had some experience in the practice of law, in the western part of the State, and supposing that I had as fair an opportunity as other gentlemen of knowing what public opinion was, I was surprised to find so strong a feeling in favor of abolishing the grand jury. I do not believe that it is the public sentiment, or that the public sentiment that is here, is a fair exponent of public sentiment throughout the State. I do not believe that there is any considerable number of the people in favor of doing away with the grand jury. What have we heard? The delegate from Cass, stated that it was public opinion in his county. Now, with great respect to him, I doubt whether that is the case with respect to his own county. I do not believe that his colleagues would agree with him. It may be true in his immediate neighborhood; unquestionably it is so; but in other parts of the county it is not so, as I am informed.

What else have we? Why, sir, a small voice from the county of Macomb. It was stated that a meeting had been held in some school house; and that there it had, with all confidence, been resolved that the institution of the grand jury shall be modified or abolished.

Have any petitions reached us from any other quarter? One would suppose that our legal tribunals would have found it out; that the judges of the supreme courts would have tried to get rid of the evils of this institution. One would have supposed that the people would have sent petitions; but in the absence of all this information I do think that it is indiscreet for this Convention to abolish this institution on the ground of public sentiment.

Therefore, this discussion will do good, it will be brought before the people, and in a short time we shall learn what is public sentiment. Public sentiment will sustain the institution. What are the objections to the institution? Let us examine them fairly; if they are founded in reason, overthrow it; if not, let us sustain it. It was established for wise purposes, by wise men.

The delegate from Cass [Mr. SULLIVAN] complains that the institution is secret—its proceedings carried on and marked in secrecy. Well, sir, I need only refer in answer, to the able argument of the gentleman from St. Joseph. No person who heard that argument could for a moment doubt that it was one of its wisest provisions. He told you truly, that crime was committed in secret, and that it was only to be counteracted by secrecy. Your horse is stolen, or your barn is burned, and if you wish to arrest the perpetrator, you must do it in secret. It would be unwise to give him notice that he may flee from justice; to make it public so that the news would reach him, and the authorities could not arrest him.

This argument comes from whom? From prosecuting attorneys—law officers whose business it is to protect your property against rogues—men whose special business it is to guard the citizens against these depredations. Will they tell you to give publicity to the fact that the individual is suspected, or seize him before he knows that you are on his track, and then give him a fair trial? In my judgment, secrecy is indispensable.

Another objection there is, sir. The arguments are, I consider, inconsistent. The same gentleman tells you that the proceedings of a grand jury are too public. First he tells you they are too secret—in a few moments he says all its proceedings are known—that there is no secrecy about it. How much this argument is worth, I submit to the Convention.

But there is another view which has more influence than any other—that is the argument of my friend from Cass, that it put it in the power of malicious persons to prosecute their revenge. If that is so, if the grand jury, as constituted by our laws, can put it in the power of any person to prosecute maliciously and successfully, it should be wiped out as a disgrace. But is it so? Most men have supposed that it was a protection to the citizen from complaints founded on malice. For the purpose of bringing authorities which will weigh more than anything I can say, I propose to read from Storey on the Constitution, vol. 3, p. 658; after describing what a grand jury is, its purposes, its object, and what its purport is, he says:

"It is obvious that the grand jury perform most important public functions, and are a great security to the citizens against vindictive prosecutions, either by the government or by political partizans, or by private enemies. Nor is this all; the indictment must charge the time and place, and nature and circumstances of the offence with clearness and certainty, so that the party may have full knowledge of the charge preferred," &c. He insists that the institution of a grand jury is a great security against malicious prosecutions by political partizans. Here, Judge STOREY, who has had some little practice, takes entirely different ground; and yet he is probably as well qualified to judge by his learning and talents, as the gentleman from Cass. I may add the names of Kent and Marshall to that of Judge Storey, whose practice and whose precept were in favor of the institution of a grand jury, as it exists. I may, with propriety, oppose the opinion of your own highest tribunal to that of the gentleman from Cass. Did you ever learn from the judges of the supreme court, that the institution of the grand jury could be diverted from its purpose to enable individuals to gratify their malice? If it has not succeeded in preventing this, it has failed in its object. Another argument adduced by the delegate from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN,] was, that every person charged with crime ought to have a public examination. He appealed to the delegates of this Convention, if they would not prefer an open examination, and have an opportunity for defence, rather than have a party go before a grand jury and get them indicted. There never was a man yet charged with crime, but would prefer to be discharged, or select his own tribunal, and be sworn clear. This has been done, time and time again. It would seem that the sympathies of certain gentlemen are all on the side of the accused; that they have no regard for the public weal; that they do not look to the protection of the persons of the citizens of the State.

The grand jury is double security that a person arrested shall not have a trial until twelve men, out of twenty-three, have passed judgment, that there is probable guilt. So far from its being oppressive, it is the greatest security that the citizen can have. When taken before a magistrate, he could defend himself; (formerly he could not;) but after that, he cannot be put upon trial until judgment is passed upon him by the grand jury—twelve men out of twenty-three—the best men, and taken from all portions of your county; and if the town assessors do their duty, they are the best men for capability. But constitute it as it should be, and as in most cases it is, after his examination, his case must be passed upon by these men, twelve agreeing; men, sir, who cannot be improperly influenced; too numerous to be bribed or corrupted; so scattered through the country that they have formed no opinion, and, therefore, cannot be prejudiced.

Is not this a protection? Will gentlemen tell me that it is no privilege, being charged with crime, to be brought before such a body of men? Tell me that this is not a privilege? These, sir, are the principal objections urged against the institution by the delegate from Cass; but there are some other difficulties in this case, which he did not attempt to meet. In the remarks to which he adverted, I did not intend to go into the discussion fully; I barely alluded to a difficulty which, to my mind, was insurmountable, and I briefly shadowed it forth; but, perhaps I was misunderstood. I attempted to show that there was a class of cases not provided for, and could not be in a satisfactory manner. I did not attempt to show that you could not, upon affidavit, base a requisition; but I did state that I then recollected two cases in which it had been done; one was held, the other failed.

What was my object? Why, to show that it was an uncertain mode—that difficulties attended it. If you see one man shoot another, a requisition based on an affidavit will reach him, and the Executive of another State will be bound to give him up; but if it is only suspicion, without positive proof, there is no way to reach him except by a bill of a grand jury. By your laws, your magistrates have no jurisdiction. You have first to arrest the criminal, then you can have an examination. Upon this subject let me call the attention to the same work that I have before quoted, Storey, p. 677. "All that would seem in such cases to be necessary is that there should be prima facie evidence before the Executive authority to satisfy the judgment that there is probable cause to believe the party guilty—such as upon an ordinary warrant would justify his commitment for trial." Now, sir, you perceive that the Executive of a State requires proof before he surrenders him up.

Would mere suspicion that you believe a man has done this, or that you think he has done that, do? or would he require that there be prima facie evidence? This you may not be able to obtain, except through the instrumentality of a grand jury. When a person is suspected of crime, a prosecuting attorney or any one else may go before a grand jury, and the finding a bill settles the question. The Executive is bound; he cannot go behind the indictment; but a requisition based on an affidavit he can deny; if the proof is not strong enough he will; he would require prima facie evidence of guilt to cause him to be given up.

Have we a substitute for grand juries? No answer has been made to this question, nor an attempt to answer, except the suggestion of the delegate from Cass, and that was imperfectly shadowed forth. Did he mean that a system of criminal information was to be resorted to? Does a prosecuting attorney stand up in this place and proclaim this principle? I ask him to repeat—that instead of a grand jury he would resort to criminal information. There is no man who has the hardihood to assume any such ground. It would give him a notoriety which would last as long as time should endure. What is a criminal information? An indictment in form and substance, filed at the mere discretion of the officer of the government.

Mr. SULLIVAN—I stated distinctly that I was not in favor of that plan—that information filed should be valid by the concurrence of one, two or three justices of the peace, or whatever should be inserted instead of that tribunal. I wanted no proceedings instituted upon the word of a prosecuting attorney.

Mr. S. CLARK—I did not believe that the gentleman dared or had the wish to assume that ground. But let us look one moment at what he would attempt to substitute—let us see if it is better. He disclaims the position that information should be filed on the mere motion of a prosecuting officer, but is willing to do so upon the certificate of a single magistrate, and this power to be granted to all—even to such as are elected sometimes in some of our towns. Dare a gentleman assume this position, and have it go to the people of this State? Does he wish to put a citizen upon trial upon the certificate of a single magistrate? I do not disagree with the gentleman about their character; they are useful in their place, but frequently unqualified.

A citizen may be dragged from a foreign State upon the mere certificate of a single justice of the peace. It resolves into this, sir: you can send for A, B and C at the instance of irresponsible men—an accusation can be made that a citizen of a foreign State has been guilty of a crime—you can drag him from home and put him upon trial.

I appeal to the law officers—I ask them to reflect. There is something to be said upon both sides, and it calls for the deep deliberation of this Convention. I trust, therefore, that we shall not take this step. This institution abandoned, what remains? What provision is there left to reach that numerous class of cases to which the gentleman from St. Joseph called your attention? He tells you that many crimes have been committed by large gangs from a neighboring State, passing backward and forward, doing their work in secret; and if you do away with the grand jury what provision have you left to reach them? I, sir, am not prepared to take this leap in the dark—I dare not do it, sir.

There is another consideration in reference to this matter; and I do not allude to it with a view of giving an opinion other than a legal argument—giving it and leaving this Convention to judge what weight it is entitled to. By the Ordinance of 1787, this institution is granted to this territory and the States composing the same. It reads: "No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land."—(Kent's Com., p. 12.) Mr. Kent says, the words "the law of the land," as used in magna charta in reference to this subject, are understood to mean due process of law; that is, by indictment or presentment of good and lawful men; and this says Lord Coke, "is the true sense and exposition of those words." Now, it was the intention (how far that may be binding upon us now may be a question, but it was the intention) to guarantee forever the institution; that whoever should inhabit this territory should have the right of presentment and examination by a grand jury, before he shall be brought to trial. In reference to the binding nature of this Ordinance lawyers differ. But without assuming it legally binding, I might give the opinion of Mr. Jefferson—he thought that it was. He was one of your progressive democrats. He deemed that it was a matter of some little consequence.

There was another objection which came from the delegate from Washtenaw. One of the objections which operated upon his mind was that the mode and manner of drawing up an indictment made it almost impossible for the prosecuting attorney to discharge his duty with ability and fidelity—made it almost impossible for him to prepare his indictment; being called on suddenly and unexpectedly, the indictments were quashed and the criminals escaped. This objection should not have much force. In most of these cases it is a very simple matter to prepare an indictment. In most cases, there are printed forms, where nothing is to be done except to fill up the name, date and offence, and it is not two minutes' work to fill one up.

But in most of these cases of offences that have been examined, they are bound over. The prosecuting officer can go to the sheriff, ascertain exactly how many criminals there are bound over, have all perfectly prepared, submit the indictments to the grand jury, and have them pass upon them. When he knows the offence, it is his business to be prepared.

Before I return to this matter, I will merely allude to the remarks of the delegate from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.] Coming from him I regretted it; for I know the influence which he wields upon this and other bodies. His judgment is in accordance with that of nine-tenths of the people of this State—that is, in favor of retaining it; but perhaps from looking around and seeing that it was likely to be stricken out, he came forward as a mediator, and to preserve the form if not the substance. What does he say sir? that he sees no necessity after an investigation had been gone into before a magistrate, to go before a grand jury. If a magistrate is as well qualified—if it is as safe a tribunal—if the party can be as well protected before a single magistrate as he can before a grand jury, then there is force in his argument. If not, I ask him to come forward, and save this institution.

But he made another remark in which I concur. I would, feeling as I do, much prefer that it should remain as it is, subject to the future action of the legislature; I would rather the question should go before the people; let them examine it, and come to a clear, dispassionate conclusion with regard to it; I would rather run that risk, than that this Convention should abolish this institution.

If I am correct in my views, and if a substitute is adopted, what will the people say when you present the constitution for their acceptance? They will say, sir, we sent you there for no such purpose; there were palpable reforms called for; we sent you there to reduce taxation; we sent you there to arrange the system to single districts, biennial sessions, and reforms in town and county government; for reforms in the judiciary; we did not send you to tamper with the rights and liberties of the citizen. Are we called upon to do this? Has public sentiment demanded that so sensible, intelligent and deliberative a body as this, should take this step? I repeat, sir, it is a leap in the dark.

There was another attack upon the institution which I deeply regretted at the time, coming from the high source it did. I allude to the language of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE.] He called it a farce. An institution, approved by the names I have mentioned, a farce—that the highest legal tribunals have been enacting a farce! Is this the language that should be used on the floor of this hall—thus to denounce an institution established for the liberty of the citizen—established by the wisest and best men, for the wisest and best purposes. We should be enacting a farce, a serious one though, if we carried out the sentiments of the gentleman from Calhoun. But he does not seek to meet it by argument; he seeks to create prejudices; and by what means? By ridicule. To my view, that is not the proper way to treat a question of this kind. What have we to do with the nobility of England, which is an institution that we have abandoned? What have we to do with the examples by which he has endeavored to prove that this institution is a farce? We are here acting as a grave, deliberative body, forming an organic law, by which the people of this State are to be governed in years to come. We are examining an institution formed by our wisest men; and if it has failed, let us strike it out; but do not let it be ridiculed. Other institutions have been abused. The institution of religion is ancient and venerable, and yet no institution has been more abused. Those who are ministers have not always conducted themselves with propriety. Shall we strike it down, or correct the abuses and maintain the institution? That would be what every christian and philosopher would seek to do—correct, reform—not destroy. But it has been said that precedent should have no influence. In one sense it should; in another it should not. If the principle has failed, precedent should have no influence; but in the absence of this fact, it should. Precedents, to a great extent, control your courts. We are influenced in all the actions of life by precedents, and with propriety, when an institution has been established as this has. In the first formation of our government it was left out, and it came near endangering the constitution itself, when submitted to the States. The public feeling was so much in favor of it, that it was amended; and it has been followed up from that day to this by every State in the Union. I would ask, in the absence of argument upon the other side, when we look back, is not precedent worth something? I ask you, if you would destroy an institution thus established, without a substitute and without a reason. Sir, it is like the farmer who would cut down the venerable oak which has furnished a shade and a protection for years, because it may have dropped an acorn upon his head.

These are some of the reasons that induced me to address you to-day. If I have erred, I am willing to be corrected; but I would warn the opposers of this institution not to destroy it without they bring forward a substitute. Let it go forth, and let the voice of the people be brought to bear upon it.

One word with reference to the proposition: I am not willing to change it substantially. I believe we ought to have the whole institution, or nothing. I do not mean to be understood that I would insist that all the petty, minor offences should be investigated by a grand jury, but I see no reason why it should be confined to capital ones. There is generally more pains taken, and stronger efforts made; the party has a fairer trial than he has in other cases. It is to protect the citizen in many cases where the crime is not capital, that the institution is found the most beneficial.

Mr. McLEOD—Mr. President: As I differ in my views on this subject from those expressed just now by my learned and estimable friend on the other side of the house, I shall proceed to a review of his position, seriatim, with whatever of success and brevity I may.

The chairman of the committee on the Bill of Rights [Mr. S. CLARK] seeks to reinstate a clause of the old constitution, which was omitted by the committee on the Judicial Department, and which tends to continue in force the institution of the grand jury, as it exists at present, and has existed from time immemorial. In support of his views he has presented us with a skilful and elaborate argument, which, from the well-known abilities of that gentleman, and his official position in regard to the subject, may be supposed to embrace all, whether of right or expediency, that can be said in favor of the proposition before the Convention. I shall, therefore, claim excuse if I occupy more time in reply than I would otherwise feel justified in occupying from the general business of the Convention.

My own position in regard to this subject is somewhat peculiar, as well from my geographical situation as the delegate from the broad counties attached to and including Michilimackinac, as from the fact that I have been a Prosecuting officer for a term of years, and have never, in a single instance, so far as my memory now serves me, appeared as counsel for the defence. As a consequence, I may believe that my views and sentiments, perhaps my prejudices—indeed all those feelings of whatever class or name which grow up from long habit and unwittingly twine themselves about us—have all been in favor of retaining the machinery which I have ordinarily employed in carrying out the duties of my office. Nor was it until the inconveniences of the present grand jury system forced themselves so palpably upon my observation, that I could at all bring myself to the consideration of the question, whether or no, the system might be dispensed with, and something less cumbrous and expensive be substituted in its stead. The district which returned me to this Convention, exclusive of the counties represented by my friend from Chippewa, covers an area equal to nearly one third of the entire State. Its boundaries cannot be given more accurately than in the language of a patriotic Kentuckian when boasting to a cavilling foreigner of the vast possession of the United States. "My country, sir, is bounded on the north by the Aurora Borealis, east by the rising sun, south by illimitable space, and west—west by the DAY OF JUDGMENT! Such, as nearly as I can ascertain them, are the limits of my district. Over this vast expanse of territory our people are scattered in little groups and villages, composed of small classes numbering a few hundred each, and representing an infinite variety of interests. From these classes, spread over so vast a space, we are compelled to summon six of our grand juries; and that, too, in a region where every day taken from the time of the juror is a serious interference with the means of subsistence. What alternative is, then, presented us? Shall we give up catching our white-fish and trout! Shall we neglect our little crops of potatoes which protrude through the unfriendly gravel, uncovered and unconscious of earth? Shall we neglect the craving demands of appetite—the bare means of support for ourselves and children, in order to inquire into offences against the State? Or shall we attend to the pressing interests of our own household, and permit crime to go unwhipped of justice. The practical effects are these. Crime is perpetrated with impunity; misdemeanors pass unnoticed; the restraints on vice are removed or lessened, until at length some felony of unusual heinousness throws us back upon the instinct of self-preservation, and we employ the semblance of legal proceedings to protect our lives and property. I say the semblance of legal proceedings, for so impossible, under our circumstances, is a technical compliance with the law, that we protect ourselves by the administration of a modification of the Lynch code in fact, dressed up, as far as practicable, in the forms of law. This condition of things obtains, to a greater or less degree, in many, perhaps all, of the smaller counties, and the results must ever be the same, to wit: an utter neglect or avoidance of the means of legal punishments, or else a suicidal submission to wrong and outrage. Which shall we choose? Accident must, in a great measure, determine.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that the documents laid before this Convention by the Secretary of State furnishes us, in a very limited degree, with the actual amount of expenses, direct and incidental, which we incur by reason of the grand jury, as at present constituted. Nor are these expenses so trifling as the delegate from St. Joseph would have us to believe. It is not the mere amount of fees to the jurors themselves, or to the returning officers, that constitute the main items of expenditure. It is the vast and incalculable items which do not appear of record, but which show in the current expenses of the county and impoverish our feeble treasuries year after year. The counties of Oakland and Livingston can bear me witness to the truth of this statement, and so, I doubt not, can most of the large counties of the State. But upon this branch of the subject I am not fitted to dwell, all unskilled as I assuredly am, to measure the value of any institution by the mere rule of dollars and cents, or to place gold in the scale against any thing that may conduce to the public weal.

I have a more serious objection to the grand jury; and one which has forced itself most painfully upon my attention in the execution of my official duties. Not long since there were two persons, in a certain representative district of this State, candidates for the same office. One of them was successful. The other, impelled by mortification and instigated by a desire for revenge, resolved upon blasting the reputation of his rival. He preferred a charge involving a serious offence to the prosecuting officer of the district. That officer, upon an examination of the matter, informed the complainant that the allegations would not sustain an indictment. "Then," said the complainant, "I will go to the grand jury, where I am sure a bill will be found." "But of what use will be your bill even if found? I shall most assuredly obtain leave to enter a nolle prosequi; and your object will be defeated." The answer of the complainant, more true than politic, deserves to be recorded and perpetuated. "I am aware of that, but my end will be attained. If the grand jury find a bill, as I know they will upon the ex parte testimony I can introduce, it will be said that twenty-three good men and true, on their oaths, believed the accused to be guilty; and then, if acquitted by the traverse jury, or discharged on a nolle prosequi, it will be said he escaped through some quibble of the lawyers." Now, sir, it is true the bill was not found; but it was only through the firmness of the Prosecuting Attorney, who threatened to expose the whole affair, and prefer a complaint against the complainant himself if he should persist in his unhallowed design. How many unrecorded instances are there of this description! How many countless cases where the motive is malicious—the object oppression, and the result disgrace and ruin to the hapless victim! Had that bill been found, a stain would have attached itself for life to a guiltless man—a stain that not all the waters of the Jordan could have washed away. The combined weight of character of twenty-three sworn citizens would have been brought crushingly and damningly to bear upon the reputation and happiness of one unfortunate, and upon his children and children's children after him. He would virtually have been accused, tried, convicted and punished—aye, punished morally, punished terribly! Scorn would have pointed her finger at his offspring; cowardly propriety would have shrunk from his approach; the Cain-mark would have been upon his brow, and in his soul, and doubt, if not conviction of his guilt, would have dogged his footsteps like an evil spectre. And yet the grand jury may have been honest and averse to wrong. Talk as we may—reason from abstractions as we will, it is nevertheless a truth in the philosophy of the human mind, that if you suggest even a bare doubt against a man's character, however unsupported by facts, you commit a positive injury which time often fails to cure. How much more when twenty-three men of standing in the community shall have solemnly put a fellow being on his trial, perhaps for an infamous offence, upon certain evidence locked up in their own breasts and which he can neither discover or explain.

I have repeatedly asked grand jurors upon what grounds they found a bill; and have, in numberless instances, been answered—"Well! A. B. and C. D. testified so and so, and we knew that if the accused was not guilty, he could easily show it upon trial. So no harm could be done. Besides, as the charge has been made, and would be repeatedly brought against the accused, we thought it only fair that he should be put upon his trial that he might convince the world of his innocence." In this case—by no means an unfrequent one—a benevolent motive was pressed into the service of oppression. The jurors seem not to have dreamed that they were uniting the weight of their individual characters and official position to the ingenious malice of the complaint and the ready testimony of the witnesses of the prosecution against the character of a fellow-citizen, unfortunate and defenceless.

Facts and reflections such as these, have induced me to examine into the workings of the ancient system; and when I found it perverted from the original and benevolent design of its institution—when I found it a terrible instrument for the purposes of malice and the infliction of wrongs—when I found it machinating in secret and springing its mysterious plottings upon the unwary victim—when I recognized it as an independent solecism in our administration of justice—as a cumbersome and expensive machine for the accomplishment of an insignificant purpose, I came to this Hall prepared to support a proposition for its instant and utter abolition. To such a conclusion, have my observations and reflections led me, nor have I been induced to swerve from it by aught I have yet heard from the ingenious and talented advocates of the system.

I now propose, sir, to review the positions assumed by my worthy friend the delegate from Kalamazoo and chairman of the committee, [Bill of Rights.]

His first position is, that the subject is a new one—one little discussed amongst our constituencies, and upon which public sentiment has not been brought to bear.

I am afraid, Mr. President, that I must leave this branch of the subject upon whatever merits it may have, to wiser and abler heads than mine. Public sentiment, as a rule for my conduct, is of indifferent potency at the best. If public sentiment be right, I am guided by it as an additional and strengthening motive; but if wrong, I despise it and pursue my own way. I yield not my conscience, my tongue or my vote, in slavish submission to public opinion, as such; nor can I at all sympathize with such as do. A decent outward compliance with the conventionalities of society, or the prejudices of a community, I can understand and appreciate; but an unresisting submission to an uninformed and wavering public opinion, which at one moment shouts "hosannah!" and the next exhausts itself in "crucify him! crucify him!" I would trample as the dust beneath my feet. On this subject I have with me the conviction of right, and I will present my own views in my own way, though like old Bullion, "solitary and alone I put the ball in motion." It seems to me strange however, sir, to discover so general a misapprehension of the position which we and each of us sustain on the floor of this Convention. I hear on all sides of me the phrases of "house," "constituents," "representatives," and others of the same purport, till I have actually fancied myself in a legislative body attending to the ordinary routine of business.

I do not consider myself as the representative of a particular constituency, as I should if I were in a legislative assembly. I represent one-hundredth part of the sovereignty of the State, that is divided into one hundred portions, and we hold them by a sort of common tenure—we have the sovereignty in common.

Now, sir, I know from what I have been able to hear, that the people think they have been oppressed, that they have to put a great deal out of their pocket and get little for it; and they have sent us here, as symbols of their distress, to carry out their views; and whatever measures suggest themselves to me, I shall present, without reference whether the subject has been mooted or not. So far with respect to public sentiment.

My friend from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] says that the judges of the Su preme Court would have found out this defect if it existed. I do not know that. I have a most unlimited amount of veneration for them, but they are not necessarily so far in advance of the age as to find this fact out alone. They may not have had time, as I have had, when perched upon a little rock at Mackinac, with nothing to distract my attention from all these moral and philosophical questions.

We have upon this floor two representatives from the Supreme bench. One has proposed—what? To indict a man before a grand jury of nine, and then put him on trial by a petit jury of twelve.

Now, there is some little doubt in the minds of our jury with respect to this necessity of a grand jury. The gentleman from Kalamazoo says that it was established for wise purposes by wise men. It may have been so, but the reason that brought it into existence has ceased. I am willing to believe that at the time of its institution it was useful. I find that it was founded for the purpose of interposing between the rights of the subject and the prerogatives of the crown; that at the time of its institution human life and liberty were as soap bubbles thrown in the air, and this was placed to guard against the injustice of the crown. When the crushed worm turned upon its heel—when the people, whose liberties were held in its iron grasp, turned in their majesty and asserted their rights and it was found necessary to appease them by placing some obstruction between.

Another view has been taken—that it goes back into the dust of ages. Those who wander in the dust get their eyes sometimes blinded.

It was supposed that a traverse jury must be composed of the commonalities, that they were more liable to be acted upon by threats and cupidity—more at the disposal of the law officers of the crown than the gentry. They supposed that the crown could threaten a traverse jury, that a trial by a traverse jury would not be a sufficient security. Some gentle blood was interposed; men whose thews and sinews were not hardened by toil and the rough winds. Therefore, the knights and gentlemen were interposed between the exactions of the crown and the liberties of the subject and the weakness of a traverse jury. They took a higher grade of men; but this has long since ceased to exist—we all feel ourselves to be kings and sovereigns. We feel that the necessity of such a state of things no longer exists, that the end for which a grand jury was instituted has ceased to be operative; in other words, that the same ends can be gained without the objections which are urged against the grand jury.

The feeling that induced our fathers to institute a grand jury was an incorrect one, and it has been under correction ever since we formed our Constitution. It is a feeling that has taken deep root and cannot be easily shaken; but, however excellent its construction was, however well it may have at the time answered its purpose, the main reason has ceased to exist. When we emerged from our revolutionary condition, all the details were a mere experiment. We had asserted human liberty and raised a platform upon its broad basis; but in detail took the system of the old world. Except with positive objections, every thing was retained, and when we formed our Constitution we took what was law before us, asking no questions for conscience' sake—so that no argument can be drawn at the present day that it was invented for a good purpose by wise men. The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] says that the charges come from the prosecuting attorney; so they do, and with a better grace than from any other class of men. These twenty-three men come before the judges under imposing circumstances; but it is the prosecuting attorney who is engaged in examining witnesses with them—who knows the general views of the members of the grand jury, and it is he who knows whether its effects are good or pernicious. I think, therefore, that it comes with a peculiar propriety from those engaged in the prosecution. Few can see the great strength of argument that is used in reply to my friend from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN;] he says his argument works both ways, that it is public and private. It is so, sir, and its privacy is useless and its publicity is useless. Now with respect to the secrecy in the case I mentioned: Here is an individual who gains all the effect of punishment where it ought to have been an open trial. It is public where secrecy would have been valuable. The secrets are borne by the birds of the air on the wings of the wind and the whole community know it—there is no secrecy where it would be valuable to the public safety. I ask you to look at this. If you go before a prosecuting attorney and make a complaint, it may be done for malicious motives and may affix a stain. But in the case of the prosecuting officer it is but one man that gives his weight. If the complaint is before a magistrate, it is only a magistrate; but when you assemble twenty-three men and can gain an indictment, the weight of twenty-three men is thrown upon you, if malice governs them.

Now I am entirely at a loss to perceive the argument on the other side, with respect to the composition of grand juries; the magistrates are composed of the same stuff as grand juries, have the same motives, passions, and virtues. Many of the justices of the peace are members of the grand jury—if you have an intelligent grand jury, you have an intelligent magistracy. If you have a grand jury ignorant, you have magistrates the same. All men are of the same earth and are subject to the same influences.

One argument deserves notice—where we have to arrest a man on a requisition. The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] tells us at the same time, that if you go to the Executive of a State for a requisition, you must give prima facie evidence before you get a requisition. Sir, I do not wish that a man should be arrested on suspicion. Does a grand jury do this? No sir, there is probable cause. This is the case where we go to a board of magistrates or one magistrate. The prosecuting attorney must show probable cause, or it should not go before either a magistrate or a grand jury, and the same weight of testimony that would induce a grand jury to find a bill, a magistrate in issuing a warrant, would authorize the executive to comply with the requisition.

If crimes are brought to my notice, if probable cause is shown that an offence has been committed, however mean the condition of the informer, I see no argument that would throw me upon the grand jury rather than upon a magistrate, for they are all influenced by the same motives. The Executive of a State would be no more than any body else.

Something has been said about the peculiar aptitude of grand juries for detecting border crimes. Sir, I can see no good argument in this reasoning. You can lay any information before a magistrate with more secrecy and with as much certainty of prompt justice being obtained, as by a bill from a grand jury. I am fully prepared to go for an entire abolition; if the Convention do not go so far, I shall go for the proposition of the Hon. delegate from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] as that proposition I consider better than retaining the institution in its present shape.

Mr. TIFFANY—I am in favor of the section, as reported by the committee. Its construction is simply this: it does not abolish it—it does not consider a grand jury requisite; and we should neither insert it in our Constitution or abolish it; because if we do so, everything will stand still until the legislature finds a substitute.

Respecting the arguments of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. S. CLARK,] if there was any force in them, I was unable to perceive it. If a magistrate receives a complaint, and it is apparent that it is founded in malice, he would be liable in trespass for it, and correctly too; but he may go before a grand jury and upon the same evidence obtain an indictment, and that throws around the prosecutor of this false accusation, a wall of defence—whereby they are shielded from all liability against their illegal acts. This is where we should object to the system. It goes beyond the law, in bringing a man to answer in the courts of justice. The law calls together the grand jury, and the grand jury can bring an innocent man to trial with no evidence at all.

There is another objection to the grand jury. When a complaint is presented to a justice of the peace, the defendant has a right to a defence. But, before a grand jury the witnesses are shut up, and what does it avail if he can show his innocence? He must go before a traverse jury to prove his innocence. The opportunity of investigating crime before a magistrate is greater than it is before a grand jury. Before the latter, the prosecuting attorney is the only man whose advice is taken. Before a magistrate there is an examination of the facts. Then, if the justice is satisfied that there is prima facie evidence of guilt made out, why not try him without the presentment of a grand jury? I am, however, opposed to its abolition. Let us leave this section as it now stands for the legislature to say what disposition shall be made of it. Let the legislature decide whether crimes shall be presented by grand juries, or some other mode; but let us not abolish it by the constitution, when we have not any mode proposed that can be substituted in its place. Before the legislature meets, several courts will be held, and they will, by the abolition of the grand jury, be deprived of the power of proceeding.

Mr. McLEOD—The schedule could manage all that.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not expect to throw much light upon this subject, but I desire to add my feeble testimony to that of others, against the system of grand juries; and I conceive there has been a misrepresentation on this floor, in regard to the force and extent of public sentiment on this question. I would not be governed by public sentiment when it is clearly against my own convictions of right; yet I would bow to it with all proper deference when it is right. Nearly a year ago, an article appeared in a Macomb paper, which was copied in nearly all the democratic newspapers in the State. It went for the total abolition of grand juries, and was generally approved of. There is a feeling prevailing through the length and breadth of the State against grand juries.

The gentleman from Kalamazoo, sir, has made some rather sarcastic remarks upon the public meeting in Macomb, held at a school house. It was a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Romeo, held at a school house, because it was a large building; and the delegates from the county of Macomb were requested by that meeting and others, to use all honorable means for the purpose of abolishing grand juries. These resolutions, I allow, would not entirely influence me against grand juries; but from an examination of the workings of the system, I am convinced that it is unnecessary, and even oppressive. No man more highly esteems the high and honorable sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Kalamazoo, while giving his reasons for clinging to the time-honored institutions of our forefathers, than I do. This is a beautiful and noble sentiment—the reverence for antiquity. Yet, though many years have rolled by and found this institution still honored and admired, we should not therefore be blinded to its faults.

In the country from which nearly all of us derived our origin, there was a time when baronial halls were found all over the country; when the rich and the great armed and entrenched themselves in strong fortresses to protect themselves; when might was right. But now, where the old fortresses frowned, are seen beautiful villas. And this arises from the greater security of life and the operation of known and equal laws.

The institution of chivalry, too, that has done more in a barbarous age to ameliorate the condition of mankind than any other, that of religion alone excepted, has fallen before the scythe of time. It inculcated high and honorable sentiments. But they have done their work—the masses have become inoculated with them; and the knight is no longer seen careering on his steed.

The institution of grand juries is more ancient than chivalry, and was in existence before the feudal system. It was of Saxon origin; and in Saxon times it was necessary to find a bill of indictment—twelve men composing a grand jury, and their decision being final and conclusive, except when an appeal of battle was claimed, or some other of the ancient tests of innocence or guilt. By degrees it has been modified, until it has become the system we now so much admire. It has been said, here, Mr. President, that it was instituted in the first place, as a check against the prerogatives of the crown; wrested from King John by the armed barons at Runnymede. This is not so. It was at first a mere court of inquiry, under the Saxon laws, to investigate and punish crime. But after the Norman conquest, when the strong arm of power had crushed the spirit of liberty, it was then first claimed as a check on the power of the crown, by the barons and gentlemen themselves, who alone formed grand juries.

Gentlemen say it has always been the bulwark of the people. Has it always given protection to life and liberty? Let them look at the long black record of the English State trials for the answer. Let us examine the mode of a prosecution by the crown. The king appointed the sheriff, and he selected as he pleased, the grand jury. He would, of course, appoint such men as would please his master. We have all read of the bloody circuit of Jeffries. Why could he, at the command of James, perpetrate such butcheries? Because the crown had, in its own hand, the instrument by which both grand and petit juries were summoned. Thousands of judicial murders have been brought about by means of grand and petit juries. They have committed the basest of crimes, and have murdered the most innocent of men.

Public sentiment is not yet ripe; but I hope to see the day when traverse juries will not be considered in the same light as they are at present; but crimes as well as all other questions, will be tried by judges elected by the people, and responsible to them.

What is there in this institution that protects the citizen? I may add my slight experience as a prosecuting officer, to that already given, that in nearly all the cases where crime is really committed, an examination takes place first before a magistrate. If the accused is held to bail or committed, he awaits the action of the grand jury, which almost always under such circumstances, finds a bill. A grand jury sometimes find a bill on the oath of a complainant, without a full investigation of the facts, and frequently on mere suspicion. So that all the purposes of justice, in my judgment, are more fully met by an examination before a magistrate. After an examination has been had, the prosecuting attorney goes before the grand jury with the case, and the testimony for the prosecution alone is stated; and that for the defence withheld. What is the use of this, when they are almost certain to find a bill? Nay, I have heard magistrates say, that as the matter was to go before a grand jury, they would hold a prisoner to bail, when I am positive that, if they had been called upon to say whether the accused should be tried or not, he would have been discharged from custody. I want no such tampering with justice. It seems to me, that if a magistrate was called upon to decide without the intervention of a grand jury, he would more carefully examine the case—that he might do nothing improperly that would affect the liberty of the citizen.

It has been supposed that the plan recommended would lead to great difficulties. But would this be the case? On an examination, the testimony is reduced to writing, and signed by the witness, when the record and testimony are sent up to the superior court. I would be in favor of the prosecuting attorney filing an information in the nature of an indictment. This might be done immediately, and the unfortunate, perhaps, innocent man, soon brought to trial, and not left to rot in a jail before conviction. It is for the benefit of the poor man—the rich man can find bail, and sometimes forfeits it to escape from justice. The poor man should be brought to trial, as soon as possible, that if he can, he may show his innocence at the earliest moment, and save his otherwise blasted reputation. I contend it would be for the benefit of the criminal, as well as for the saving of expense. The machinery would be less cumbersome, and justice more expeditious. Besides, the weight of the influence of a bill found by twenty-three good men of a county is sufficient, in many cases, to damn the cause of the person accused.

The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] is afraid that certain classes of criminals cannot be arrested; that there is no mode of proceeding against those who are suspected of crime. Can we proceed justly against any man or men on mere suspicion? It is opposed to the spirit of our institutions, and—

Mr. S. CLARK—I said for the purpose of getting proof, where there was no means of getting testimony, except by a grand jury—that the grand jury could find proof where no other means would avail, when a party is not arrested.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Well, sir, if crime is suspected in any part of this county, can not the prosecuting attorney or complainant go before a magistrate and inform him, by affidavit, that he believed so, cite his witnesses and have an ex parte preliminary examination—a sort of little grand jury? If the law is not sufficiently stringent now to compel their attendance, how easily could it be made so. I believe that can be done, and has been done, as the law now exists, so that the objection is of no validity.

It has been suggested that a person might be put on trial through the malice of an officer. I think there is no danger of that, for the pressure of public sentiment is upon him—he is responsible to the people. The writ of habeas corpus still remains—we do not propose to abolish it. By that writ we have a right to examine into a commitment and the testimony on which it was founded. It is the easiest thing in the world to bring up a case and settle the question, whether the criminal is properly held to bail or not.

The argument of expense has been adverted to. While I should think nothing of the expense of maintaining a valuable right, I would avoid any useless expense if possible. An examination takes place before the magistrate that would be the same by the system proposed. Under the present system you incur the additional expense of going afterwards before a grand jury, summoned from all parts of the county—paying the sheriff for summoning them—again summoning the witnesses for the people—paying for the attendance of three or more officers to wait upon the grand jury—and what is worse and more useless than all, taking up the time of courts and sinking vast amounts of money by those frivolous cases which might as well be disposed of at once before a magistrate. It seems to me, sir, this expense might be done away with without injury to the citizen, and with great advantage to the pockets of tax-payers.

I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kalamazoo and hope it will not prevail; and further, I think grand juries should in express terms be abolished.

Mr. BUSH—I have listened to the discussion with considerable interest, and I have concluded that our duty is marked out and clear; mine is, at least. I believe that this Convention is as good an exponent of public sentiment as any we can have in the State. Well, sir, taking the views of the different delegates, what do we learn? We learn that doubts exist with regard to this institution in the minds of most. Some say that it is not safe to abolish it—that public justice cannot be carried on without it, and that violence and crime would go un-whipped of justice. Others contend that it is not essential to the ends of justice. Conflicting views are presented by gentlemen from the same county. Then what is our duty? Shall we—when men whose opinions are entitled to the highest consideration thus differ—shall we insert in the fundamental law of the land, words that will forever make the institution absolutely necessary and imperative upon the country? I trust not. Shall we take the other extreme, when public opinion is not settled? I trust not.

Let us look back but a few years. How long was public sentiment discussing other subjects upon which it is now settled—for instance, the propriety of electing a justice of the peace? Ten years ago but few men dared to hazard the opinion that judges should be elected, and the finger of scorn was pointed at it by every professional man in the State. Now how changed, and within ten years; and the light of experience shows that it is perfectly safe and the best way. So with some other officers. Shall we in this matter fix the term in the constitution, when within five years the spirit of the age may demand a change? Does the gloom of antiquity so dazzle the eyes of the gentlemen?

I am willing to leave it to the Legislature; if public opinion demands it, it will be abolished; if it is found that justice is perverted, it will be restored. The Legislature will, to the extent of their ability, carry out the wishes of the people. Public sentiment is not yet settled; do not abolish it; you may inflict a serious injury, but do not place it in the Constitution. You may find that you would be better without it. All must agree that it is expensive.

If there is any thing to be corrected, it is the serious expense of the Government. The people have cried out for reforms in the expenses of the Government, and perhaps there is not any one thing that can be dispensed with, that entails as much expense as this institution. It has been an expense to the county of Livingston, of from $10,000 to $20,000. It may be of use, but leave this matter as it has been reported, and we are safe; take either of the extremes and we may do injury, while the matter will soon be settled by public opinion.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered the following as a substitute: "It shall be competent for the Legislature to change, modify or abolish the present grand jury system."

Pending which, on motion of Mr. WHITE, the Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The President announced a communication from the Auditor General in answer to a resolution of inquiry adopted by the Convention on the 17th inst.

The same was read and laid upon the table.

The Bill of Rights being under consideration,

Mr. SULLIVAN remarked, that having twice before addressed the Convention upon the subject of abolishing grand juries, he should say but few words, and that by way of reply to gentlemen who had today addressed the Convention on the other side. The gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. CLARK,] had inquired why, if the grand jury system is a bad one, the Judges of the Supreme Court, had not petitioned for its abolition. He did not pretend to know what the opinions of the Supreme Court Judges were upon this subject. He denied, however, that it could be fairly inferred from their silence and inaction that they are satisfied with the system as it is. Obvious considerations of propriety and delicacy would prevent them from making an attempt to influence, as a body, the actions of this Convention. As individuals, they are entitled to their opinions, and the free and unrestrained expression of them; but to bring their official power and influence and dignity as a body, to bear upon this Convention, would savor far too much of dictation; and he was satisfied they had no disposition to do it. He did not approve of awaiting the recommendation of any five or six men upon this subject, however eminent their position or talents.

We are sent here to frame a Constitution without dictation from any quarter. It is to us the trust is confided and according to our own judgment it is to be fulfilled. The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] is in favor of an elective judiciary.

Is he sure that such is the opinion of the Judges of the Supreme Court? He is in favor of an independent supreme court system. Is he certain that this is the system which they would recommend? He had said that we are not to await the recommendation of any department of government. Still less are we to wait the action of the judiciary—a department for which he had indeed high veneration—whose habits and pursuits were such as to give them great powers of analysis and reasoning, but who, were yet, from the necessity of their pertinacious adherence to precedents, apt to acquire an undue reverence for the past, to entertain a fondness for ancient institutions and a disinclination for important reforms. There were eminent exceptions to the rule; but the rule he believed to be as he stated. We have been referred to the opinion of Judge Storey in favor of this institution. He did not understand from anything read on this occasion, that he was in favor of it. Judge Storey gave a history of grand juries, and spoke of it as one of the designs of the institution to interpose a shield between the citizen and unjust accusation. It was merely historical. He did not consider it as an expression of his own opinion in reference to the subject. If it was, we are not to be shackled by it. There is not an error in science, or politics, or religion, that may not be bolstered up by the authority of some great name. He could prove by the same authority which the gentleman quoted, that judges should hold their office during good behavior, and that they should be appointed by the Executive. It is only by breaking over the authority of great names, that important reforms are ever effected. The Savior of mankind, the greatest of all reformers, demolished at once all the ethics of the schools, and all the institutions of religion in the world. Our reformed protestant religion, in which most of us believe, was founded upon the ruins of errors that had existed for centuries.

When he addressed the Convention formerly, he stated that it was vastly better for the accused that he should have a public examination, where he could cross examine witnesses and introduce evidence. The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] admits that it would be better for the accused, but not equally well for th public. Now, it struck him with great force, while he made this admission, that in quoting the opinion of Judge Story as authority, he repudiated the reason upon which that opinion was founded. The reason which Judge Storey assigns for a grand jury is, that it tends to shelter the innocent from unfounded accusations. Now, the gentleman from Kalamazoo insists upon it, only as a measure beneficial to the public. While, therefore, he presses upon this Convention the opinion of Judge Storey as a basis of action, he admits his entire want of confidence in the reasoning by which it is sought to be sustained. The Ordinance of 1787 has been supposed, by the gentleman from Kalamazoo, to stand in the way of abolishing grand juries. It provides that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, except by judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. It is insisted, and authority is produced to sustain it, that the design of the provision was to secure to the inhabitants of the north-western territory immunity from punishment for crime, except by virtue of established legal proceedings, among which is a presentment or indictment by grand jury. It appeared to him that it was quite a strained and far-fetched construction of the Ordinance. But, whether that opinion was just, or whether the Ordinance of '87, rules of inheritance and all, had any application to us, were questions he should not consider. He did not believe the Convention considered it all applicable to us. Innumerable regulations had been passed in this State in opposition to it. The gentleman from Kalamazoo himself [Mr. S. CLARK] virtually discards it as authority. For, if it is binding, no man can be punished for any offence without indictment or presentment by a grand jury; and yet the gentleman does not insist upon presentment or indictment where minor offences are committed.

He had been charged with gross inconsistency in complaining at one moment that the proceedings of the grand jury were secret, at another that they were public. He had supposed that he explained himself upon this point in a manner not to be misunderstood. In this he regretted that he was mistaken, and was glad that the gentleman from Mackinac [Mr. McLEOD] had explained in his clear and lucid manner, what he had himself stated but feebly and imperfectly. The complaint, as had been forcibly said, was both against their secrecy and publicity. They were secret where they ought to be public—they were public where they ought to be secret. When persons are complained of to a grand jury, the crimes of which they are accused and the result, every body finds out; for these are facts disclosed by witnesses, and they are precisely the matters which should be secret. The manner in which the examinations are conducted, the kind of evidence received, the exhibitions, if any exist, of partiality or prejudice, these are matters which should be public. Substitute one, two or three magistrates in the place of a grand jury, let them receive complaints secretly, and where the accused can be found, let the examinations be public, and you obtain the double advantage of secrecy and publicity—of secrecy where it is wanted, of publicity where that is desirable. A great deal has been said of the incompetency of magistrates to discharge the duties which will devolve upon them if grand juries are abolished; and yet these same incompetent magistrates, in point of fact, bind over almost every person who is convicted of infamous crime. The practical effect of the proposed measure is to change but very little the power of magistrates—it is principally and almost entirely to destroy another tribunal. In opposition to the opinion expressed of the utter incompetency of magistrates, he referred to the fact that ever since we had been a State, and long previous to it, they had been pronounced competent by the people to try civil cases where the amount in controversy did not exceed one hundred dollars. To do that requires a far greater stretch of intelligence than to discharge the duties proposed to be confided to them, because the criminal law is far less complicated, and its administration requires far less legal learning than that of the civil. Consider the vast number of cases disposed of by this tribunal, a number far exceeding that of all the other courts combined—consider how few cases are taken by appeal or certiorari from their decision; compared with the whole number adjudicated, in how few instances are their decisions reversed, and he thought it would be manifest to any one that their incompetency was not as represented; but that, on the whole, whatever individual exceptions might exist, they were a substantial, intelligent and trustworthy body. He would not pursue the subject further; he did not rise, as already stated, to enter into a vindication of the propriety of abolishing grand juries, but simply to reply to some arguments in favor of its continuance to which he had not before adverted. That he had done, and as the discussion had been protracted and the convention were evidently becoming weary of it, he would pursue the matter no further.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I do not rise, sir, to make a speech, as the remarks in favor of grand juries have been so fully answered that there is no need. I wish to read from a law magazine. At the quarter sessions for the county of Middlesex, England, the judge in his charge to the grand jury, remarked, that he hoped the bill to abolish the grand jury system, then before the House of Commons, would pass into a law. The editor of the Law Magazine says: "We wish our judges would follow his example, as it is time that this relic of oppression should be done away, and that grand juries be no longer permitted to sit in mystery and darkness in this land of freedom."

✓This is good common sense, and accords well with the principle that grand juries are inconsistent with the principles of our government.

Are not magistrates our own countrymen? Grand juries are the same.—I wish to see the day come when the judges will be elected by the people; not looking back to the dust of past ages, but adapting themselves to the wants of the present day. I do not believe that the wisdom of ages gone by should be exclusively looked to; there is wisdom in the present day. And I believe that there is more protection, more safety in the officers elected by the people, than in all the grand juries there has ever been.

In reply to the arguments of the President, in respect to the moral power, I stated that there was moral power in a great many places—in a school room—not only in places—in a newspaper; and that many trials before a grand jury were farces.

What magic is there in twelve? It has been said that there were twelve tribes, twelve patriarchs, twelve apostles; but the number of seven is no less peculiar. There are seven stars, seven seals, seven spirits, seven wonders, seven wise men, and many other sevens; and for what good reason should not that be the number as well as the magic number of twelve?

I did intend to have answered the arguments of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, but they have been fully answered.

One remark I may make. Would the Governor of any State refuse to give up a person when the requisition was in accordance with law? Must we keep the grand jury in session for the purpose of making these requisitions? Must not the Executive conform to the laws of the State? I think it an absurdity to affirm the contrary.

Mr. HANSCOM said that he had listened with profound attention to the debates upon this, as he considered it, most important question. But one gentleman, his honorable friend from Kalamazoo, [Mr. CLARK,] had argued in favor of the incorporation of the provision contained in the old constitution and in the constitutions of the various States of the Union, as applied to grand juries. Several gentlemen, for whose opinions he entertained the greatest respect, had advocated the other extreme, and proposed, not only the total annihilation of the grand jury, but, by the incorporation of a restrictive provision, to place it beyond the power of future Legislatures or of the people, except by a re-organization of the organic law, to create or re-organize it.

Common courtesy at least demanded that some answer should be made to the gentlemen who had so liberally showered invectives upon an institution that, by many, was regarded as the safe guard and shield of the citizen, and the best guardian of the rights of society.

This contest has assumed a triangular form—the two extremes and the middle course, or that policy that has been alluded to as the one favored by the honorable gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,]—placing him in the attitude of a political trimmer, a character not unlike that by the accomplished historian, McCauley, ascribed to Halifax. But he was fearful that he should, upon this question, be compelled to adopt a similar policy. He was unwilling to adopt either of the extremes—there was danger in the one, and the other, in his judgment, was impolitic and unwise.

Both wisdom and prudence would dictate that before we tore down and razed from its foundations the edifice that has sheltered us from infancy to manhood, we should at least make preparation for the erection of some tenement to shelter us from the tempest and the storm. But here one proposition was to adopt, as applied to the affairs of society and to the administration of criminal law, this unwise and imprudent course. He warned gentlemen that they were treading on dangerous ground.

Another proposition was to retain the present system as it was, with all its cumbrous machinery and manifest defects, and to place beyond the law-making power the means of applying a corrective. As applied to the higher grade of offences—those involving life or punishment in the State prison—those that render the citizen infamous and should operate as a deprivation of the most valuable and sacred rights—he was disposed they should be passed upon by some tribunal, analagous at least, to the grand jury, before the party charged should be put upon his trial before the traverse jury.

It was one of the citizens' most valued rights—it was one of the guards that wisdom and humanity had dictated and experience had proved necessary to be placed as a barrier to shield the individual against oppressions of government, the influence of associated power, or the designs of the malignant and vindictive prosecutor. But what was the substitute proposed? The old monarchical covert and the meretricious system of information, that had prevailed and would prevail in the absolute and tyrannical governments of the old world. It would be found but illy adapted to the free institutions of our own country, and, as he believed, destructive to private rights, and abhorrent to the feelings of every freeman in the land.

As a matter of economy, examinations before justices of the peace were proposed to be conclusive, and force the party charged to appear before the traverse jury in the circuits for trial; and it has been remarked that in all cases where the party was bound over by the justice or examining magistrate, an indictment followed. So far as his experience and observation were concerned, such was far from the fact. On the contrary, not to exceed one-half, or perhaps one-third, of the persons who, by the determination of examining magistrates were held to answer, were indicted. The grand jury, selected from the great body of citizens, scrutinized with great care the character of the parties complaining and charged—the nature of the offence—the motives that influenced the complainants—the amount of credit due the witnesses. Strangers to the transaction, uninfluenced by fear, favor or affection, their finding was generally just. Exceptions there were, it was true; but those few exceptions furnished no argument against the system. As well might it be argued that the Congress of the Union or the Legislatures of the States should be abolished, or that all your judicial tribunals should be suppressed, because of the enactment of bad laws or the giving a bad decision in isolated cases; the institution of christianity might be assailed upon such an assumption, with quite as much propriety.

But another and great objection is, that secrecy is among the recognized modes of proceeding in grand juries; and that by reason of that fact, injustice may be done to the citizen. Gentlemen forget that the objects of a grand jury are two-fold—the protection of the individual is one; the guardianship of society against the depredations of individuals, is another; and this feature in its organization, is designed to subserve particularly the latter. It might also be important as applied to the reputation of persons charged with the commission of crime. Crimes are ever perpetrated in secret, and no effective system of police ever has been, or could be devised, unless the operations of the agents to whom those duties are confided, acted with secrecy. The torch of the incendiary has been applied at midnight to your dwelling. The crime has been committed; and it becomes the duty of those administering the law, to ascertain the perpetrators. The law of necessity, of self preservation, compels you to investigate in secret.

But another objection is, that it is anti-republican and anti-democratic; and the course of argument adopted to prove it, would equally well prove that every institution designed to guard property, liberty, or life, was equally so. Much had been said by gentlemen, as to the danger of placing in the hands of a malicious prosecutor the means of destroying the reputation of the citizen, by continuing a system where the proceedings were shrouded in mystery. In theory the argument sounded well, and had at least the merit of appearing plausible; but practically, it had no foundation; and in fact, the very opposite was true. But was not the plan proposed to be substituted open to much more serious objections? You may have an incompetent prosecuting officer, or an incompetent examining magistrate, and the ends of public justice be defeated; or you may have a malignant and malicious prosecutor, and the rights of the citizen endangered; and while he had the highest respect for justices of the peace, and regarded them generally selected with reference to their fitness, it was needless to deny but that stupidity and ignorance, knavery and rascality, at times, were elevated to the bench of that class of courts; and here it was proposed to leave to that body of men—to the dicta of either of the four proposed to be elected in every township—the power to not only commit or bind over to answer, the party charged, but to make their action conclusive upon the prosecuting officer, and absolutely put the accused upon trial before the traverse jury in your courts of record. Either he was entirely mistaken, or in the more populous counties the criminal calendar would be loaded with a number of causes, as yet entirely unprecedented in the history of the State; and not only enormous expenses entailed upon us, but a flood of evils follow the arrangement, that, when aggregated, would be unendurable. The proposed experiment was a dangerous one, and he asked gentlemen to reflect that the proposed amendment placed beyond the power of the legislature to restore the present system, or one analogous to it, except by a constitutional amendment. Leave it to the legislature, and the people at least, to pass upon the question, so that if your experiment fails, they can at least have power to re-construct what we have torn down.

But, sir, what weight is there really in the objections urged—that malignant prosecutors may ruin the innocent citizen—that, under this system, the expenses of the administration of the criminal laws are to be decreased—the persons composing the grand juries are frequently men unfit for the duties. Then comes another class who tell us it has existed long enough, and we ought to experiment in something new. Experimenting in your fundamental laws was, to say the least, dangerous. But let us look at the charge that is urged, that this institution endangers the rights of the citizen. My judgment leads me to conclude that the reverse is true. Who ever saw a grand jury assembled, that had not upon it some gentleman of the highest order of intelligence; of a thorough acquaintance with human nature, of sagacity and intelligence, who was seldom at fault—men, in short, of most honorable and manly character? Such, sir, is most unquestionably the fact. By reason of their isolation, they cannot be supposed to partake of the prejudices or the feelings, one way or the other, that of necessity exist in the neighborhood or immediate locality where the offence charged was perpetrated, or where the accuser and accused reside, and have their respective partizans and friends; and as a necessary and natural consequence, their action would not only be entirely impartial, as applied to the people and the party charged, but absolute independence of action is secured, the natural and necessary element to induce the fearless and efficient administration of the law; and sir, it is not at all presumable that a body of men thus selected from distinct and different localities, and placed in the jury box, will act otherwise than right and just. These are the same men who constitute your justices of the peace; and it is a far-fetched and unwarrantable conclusion to say that any one of this same number could better guard society and the individual charged, than the whole body when acting in concert, and their inquiries directed to the same end, and having in view the same purposes. The individual, who, instigated by malignant motives, designs the ruin of an enemy, would find far greater facilities before a single justice of the peace or examining magistrate than before any grand jury that ever yet was empanelled. If a man of wealth and influence, he could at all times procure the aid of talented, yet unprincipled legal advisers, to aid his schemes of vengeance. He selects his own tribunal, and the individual thus selected, would of course be chosen with special reference to his adaptation to consummate with most certainty the work of destruction, and the ruin of the party accused; and here, sir, the fiat of that magistrate so selected is to be conclusive upon the innocent party. He stands before the world a convicted felon, until a trial before a traverse jury, involving him in expenses that may work his ruin, shall have pronounced his innocence. Notwithstanding the acquittal, the work of destruction is actually accomplished. But this is but one of the few phases in which this subject must be viewed, in order to fully understand and justly appreciate the enormities that might be practiced under it. Your law officers—your prosecuting attorneys have been, and may again, be influenced by malignant and unworthy motives; and here you propose to invest that officer with this most tremendous and dangerous power, without placing between him and his victim the grand jury—that institution that has ever been known and recognized since its existence, as the most effectual barrier that you could interpose between the exactions of power, the demands of excited passions and popular tumult, and the citizen. Tell me not, then, that the great objects that led to its incorporation into the great charter of British liberty, into the fundamental law of this Union, into the fundamental law of the various States, has ceased to exist. Those reasons may not exist to the extent now that may have existed in times past; but they have not yet ceased to operate; and while man's nature remains unchanged, while organized government exists, they can never cease to be operative.

But, sir, I have thus far spoken of the institution as the defence of the individual. There is another and still more important element of its organization that must not be forgotten—the protection of society; and it has been during this discussion that I have heard for the first time, that it was anti-republican, anti-democratic, to ferret out and ascertain the perpetrators of crime, by investigations conducted in secret. If it really be contrary to the genius and spirit of our institutions and government to pursue inquiries, designed to ascertain who has, at midnight, assassinated a fellow citizen, or who is the incendiary who has applied the torch to your dwelling, the merit of the discovery is due to members of this Convention, and the science of government and of the administration of the criminal law has been, as yet, most imperfectly understood. Sir, the very fact of a crime having been committed, presupposes that it was perpetrated in secret. The fact that a crime has been committed, may be entirely apparent—most usually is so. The inquiry before your judicial tribunals is, who was the perpetrator? You find a citizen murdered—the fact is apparent. You find your dwelling reduced to ashes. You are conscious that it was the work of an incendiary. Then commences the inquiry as to the perpetrators, and upon the assumption of gentlemen, the public should be notified in the most ample manner practicable, that A, B or C, was suspected, or that there were facts and circumstances tending to indicate that he or they were the guilty party. Such a course of proceeding would present a novelty in the administration of this most important branch of jurisprudence, that would, beyond doubt, meet the entire approbation of every rogue and vagabond in the country, whose business it is to depredate upon society. Whether it would as well suit, or be adapted to the interests of the law-abiding portion of our citizens, I leave gentlemen to determine. Away with all such far-fetched and impracticable schemes; they are entirely unworthy the intelligence of this body, or the people who sent us here. They did not convene us here to tear down and destroy every safeguard that the experience and wisdom of ages had created, to guard their lives, their reputations and property.

But, while one gentleman argues in favor of its abolition because it is a secret tribunal, another tells you it should be abolished because it is too public. This last objection, if true—and I concede that to some extent it may be so—is a misfortune, and only shows that no system that is absolutely perfect can be devised. But we are told that the institution is to be abolished as applied to the city of London. Well, sir, suppose the fact to be so. Does it follow that a system of criminal police adapted to that great city would properly apply to the small towns or rural districts of our State? But, it was assumed by gentlemen, at least by the venerable gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] that this abolition in that city was induced because of its tendency to oppress or work injustice to the individual citizen. I, sir, understand the matter entirely different. By reason of the enormous increase of crime in that gigantic metropolis, it has for years been a subject of inquiry among the political economists and statesmen of that country whether the safety of society, the protection of its great interests, must not be more securely guarded, even at the expense of surrendering some of those guards designed to protect individuals, and adopt more summary and extraordinary modes of proceedings. But there is no parallel between their condition and ours; and no argument drawn from any system of criminal police adopted either in London or any of the great continental cities of Europe—Paris, Vienna or Rome—can with any propriety have any force as applied to us. What, sir! will gentlemen seriously talk of introducing among us the arbitrary and tyrannical modes of proceedings existing in the absolute governments of the old world?

We are told that there are States and governments that get along without grand juries. True, sir, there are many, and, in fact, most of the governments of the earth, that have no such institution. Russia, Austria and Turkey might have been cited, and should have been, to have shown, as they do most clearly, the fact that grand juries and arbitrary or tyrannical governments do not exist together; they are peculiar to free governments only. It is only where public safety and private security go hand in hand—where the rights, powers and duties of both the government and the citizens are defined, limited and controlled, that a grand jury has ever found favor or even existed.

The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. CLARK] asked gentlemen who propose the total annihilation of the system, and the incorporation into the constitution of a provision placing it beyond the power of the Legislature or the people to restore or create any system of grand juries, for a substitute. The only answer I have heard was that the wisdom of the Legislature would find a substitute. Yes, sir, the wisdom of the Legislature, in a session of forty days, only to occur once in two years, was to provide all the principles and details of a code of criminal procedure for the State. The whole thing is fraught with mischief and danger. The Legislature devise and perfect a system! Sir, with all the boasted wisdom assembled in this hall, we have not as yet been able to find a substitute—not even to propose one that any sane man would dare have put in practice. The old system of criminal information is disclaimed by the gentleman from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN;] and yet the system proposed is but the same thing under a new guise and a different name; and I defy any gentleman here to point out the difference. Substantially it is the same. Gentlemen seem to forget that the right to deprive the citizen of his personal liberty, to subject him to imprisonment, is one of the most tremendous powers conferred by the people of this country upon their government. They have conferred the power for wise purposes; but in doing so they never designed to destroy all the guards placed by the wisdom of ages between them and the exercise of that power. Will any gentleman on this floor seriously contend that at the mere beck of some prosecuting attorney, who controls some examining magistrate, upon suspicion merely, any citizen of our State may be dragged from his home and compelled to undergo a trial before a traverse jury in a court of record, for a pretended violation of law. But, sir, this power is not proposed under this system to be confined to those resident within our own jurisdiction. The same power that can act at home you propose to act universally. Under the practical workings of your proposed plan, an innocent man may be torn from his home in a distant State—brought here for trial—his reputation injured—his fortune dissipated, at the beck of either one of your two thousand justices of the peace in our State. Ingenuity could not devise a better plan to enable the vindictive, the unprincipled or the malignant, to gratify all the passions of hatred, of malice, of envy or of wickedness than you now propose. But, sir, you retain, even the semblance of a grand jury, and you render comparatively impotent all these efforts at mischief.

But, there is another and most important class of cases that gentlemen seem to have overlooked. I refer to crimes perpetrated within our jurisdiction by individuals or bands of desperadoes from other States or countries. Crimes of the highest magnitude may be perpetrated, and the perpetrators are in a foreign jurisdiction before you can, by process of law, arrest them. What will you substitute for the investigations and indictment of the grand jury, upon which a requisition follows as a matter of course, and which is of itself conclusive evidence of probable cause, and by the comity of the States of the Union, and the stipulations of treaty as applied to nearly all the governments in connection with ours, is unquestioned by the Executive authorities of those States and governments? A little reflection will convince gentlemen that they are proposing a most dangerous experiment—one beset with difficulties innumerable; and that too, sir, in our organic law.

If the Legislature commit errors, however great, they can be retrieved—the next session may correct the mischief. There are experiments that might with propriety be tried there, that it would be most unwise to try here.

Sir, I can only look upon this proposition as fraught with danger, both to individuals and society. On the one hand you place it in the power of any malignant villian to destroy the reputation of the object of his hatred—to drag him into your highest judicial tribunals, charged with the commission of the most infamous of crimes; and though theoretically considered and held as innocent until convicted, yet practically condemned as guilty until a verdict of a jury shall have announced his innocence; and even then not relieved from the suspicions that ever attach to those accused of crime, even after acquittal.

On the other hand, you are proposing to break down and forever destroy the best guard yet instituted to protect society against the perpetrators of crime.

Now, I ask gentlemen who seek the destruction of this time honored institution, to at least propose to us some plausible, some possible substitute—that in deserting an institution around which has centered the hopes and affections of Englishmen and Americans for centuries—we may at least have an imaginary excuse. We are charged, sir, by the gentleman from Calhoun with clinging to this institution because it found its origin in the mists of antiquity. I need not stop to answer such a suggestion; because an institution or a principle is old, it furnishes, in my judgment, no valid reason for its overthrow. But, sir, as matter of fact, the origin of the present grand jury is not so completely obscured by those mists as that gentleman supposes. No, sir, the history of the struggle between the barons and the people of England on the one side, and the crown on the other, that led to the memorable and, for that day and age, the extraordinary concessions made by king John to the barons and people at Runnymede, is matter of sober history, and as familiar to the English and American schoolboy as any incident connected with the history of our mother country. Magna Charta is the very basis upon which the institutions of this government now rest. The great and fundamental principles of human liberty—of the rights of the citizen or subject—of the limitations imposed upon arbitrary power, were there most clearly, specifically and admirably defined. And, sir, to that charter and the great and invaluable truths there enunciated, are we, in common with the people of these United States, indebted for the social, religious, civil and political freedom and privileges now enjoyed. It was an infringement of that charter that peopled this continent. It was a violation of its provisions that unfurled the sails of the May Flower and landed the Pilgrims upon the rock of Plymouth. It was the attempted abrogation of its provisions that allied the colonies of this Union in resistance to the mother country, and led to the declaration of independence, the war of the revolution and the freedom of these States.

Sir, gentlemen talk of progress, and have the hardihood to call this proposed innovation progress. It is progress backwards—progress towards despotism—towards the dark ages, when mankind were worse than serfs, the playthings of arbitrary power. The struggle to secure these very rights now proposed to be abrogated was only purchased by the blood of millions who struggled in the great cause of popular freedom—it was a concession wrung from arbitrary power to the people. And now, sir, in this enlightened age, in this free land, it is gravely proposed to go back to the system devised by tyrants to enslave and fetter the people—to a system devised to keep in the ascendant the divine right of kings.

But, I have trespassed too long upon the patience of the Convention; the importance of the subject under consideration I consider a sufficient apology. In conclusion, permit me to deal for a few moments in matters that I regard as having a practical effect upon the subject under consideration. I am no advocate for the present system, as it now exists in our State. I have long thought it liable to the most serious objections. The whole system needs re-organization, pruning and rearrangement; that is a different thing from total annihilation. A diseased limb may need to be amputated—a useless branch lopped off—and yet not engender the necessity of destroying the life of the patient or cutting down the tree.

Now, sir, I am in favor of leaving this whole matter to the Legislature. Make no provision in the constitution requiring you to retain the present system, nor any completely abrogating, not only the present, but any and all other systems. If we make no provision on the subject, the present system will remain until some other is called for by the people and adopted by the Legislature. If the Legislature make mistakes they are easily corrected; if we make them the mischief is incalculable. Then let the people pass judgment upon this question, and we are bound to presume that the Legislature, coming as they will from the people, elected by single districts, will reflect their will.

I have ever been opposed to requiring all or any of the lower grades of offences being submitted to a grand jury. I think it useless and unnecessary. Organize by law proper tribunals to try such causes in the most summary way you please; make the proceedings as summary and cheap as practicable; burthen the people as little as possible, to dispose of that branch of your criminal jurisprudence. But when you come to the higher grade of offences, as I have already suggested, those involving considerations of the least importance to the party charged—when his life is endangered, or may be the forfeit—when incarceration for life in the State's prison may be his punishment, if convicted—when he is to be rendered forever infamous—I ask that the grand jury may be interposed between him and the government.

I am opposed then, sir, to both extremes here proposed. I am unwilling, on the one hand, to tie the people of this state down to a continued adherence to the present cumbrous and unnecessarily expensive system; on the other, I am equally or still more opposed to placing beyond the people's power the means of creating or continuing some kind of grand jury system, if their exigencies, (as I believe they will,) should require it.

Any feasible and practical measure of reform upon this or any other subject that will tend to the better administration of the laws, the reduction of the burthens now imposed by way of taxes or otherwise upon the people, will meet my cordial approval and warmest support. But sir, in the language of the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. CLARK,] I am unwilling to "take this leap in the dark." And I ask other gentlemen to reflect that they are not only proposing a leap in the dark, but an irretrievable one. One that may visit upon the people of Michigan, consequences most disastrous. Then, sir, let not the mere desire of novelty and change induce us to forget our high obligations to the people, and while pursuing phantoms, forget the substance, and run the risk of entailing incalculable evils, instead of in securing by our action, results beneficial to our citizens, not only now, but for all coming time.

Mr. ———— I shall trespass but little upon the time of this Convention; and that merely to explain my views with regard to the vote that I shall give with reference to this institution.

An objection has been taken on the ground that the abolition of the grand jury would cause a difficulty in arresting fugitives from justice. I do not see, sir, what more difficulty will exist than at present; the same facilities will exist as now. The application for a requisition has after all to be subjected to the discretion of the Executive of the State, whether from the finding of a grand jury or of a magistrate; and I apprehend that the Executive would always look at the reasonableness of the requisition and the weight of the testimony, and not blindly follow either the indictment of a grand jury or the certificate of a magistrate.

I do not think, for the determination of this question, we need to take for granted, that the magistrates are to have the whole power in their hands. I do not propose this; I propose to leave it open, so that the legislature may try the experiment; therefore, I hope that this will be left open for future action; if we cannot do without it, we can revert to it. I am opposed to prohibiting the legislature on this subject. I have no fears as to this experiment, therefore I wish that it should be left open.

Gentlemen say that the legislature will have neither the ability or the time to carry out the details of a system. Well, then, let them continue the present system; although I apprehend such arguments are only to hear oneself argue, rather than from a good foundation. If you insert a provision authorizing the Legislature to pass such a law if called for, it will soon be done. It is not a proper subject for this Convention to be engaged in; and that is the only reason why the details of a system have not been brought forward.

I shall vote for the bill as it now stands—say nothing about the system in any respect—because I am convinced that the grand jury system is bad with regard to the expense, because it fails to attain its ends, and because it has become a cumbersome part of the machinery of the law.

If criminals had to be indicted by a grand jury previous to being arrested, nine out of ten criminals would escape; they would hardly ever be arrested. All the arresting and binding over is done by a magistrate. It expedites the action. One of the defects of the present system is that the indictments are all prepared before hand. It seems to lead directly to this. The gentleman from Kalamazoo, by his own admission, prepared his indictments before the grand jury sat, before he knew whether a bill would be found or not. What was the use? Crime was committed—the criminals were arrested—the witnesses known—the indictments drawn up except being submitted to the grand jury—the grand jury takes the advice of the law officers. Therefore, it is a useless expense. Shall we keep it because it has been a good institution once—keeping it for the good it has done, when we have no longer need for it?

We are sorry to part with an old acquaintance, even if it be a troublesome one; but it is not only useless, but its pretended benefits are by no means commensurate with the expense. Are we guarding our rights by retaining it? Our rights are not in its keeping. Our rights are only in danger when a secret inquisition sets and we have no opportunity of knowing by whom we are charged. Such has not always been its character. It has been in former times a shield and bulwark to the citizens. In those days it was a good institution, but it has answered its purpose. Intelligence has rendered it useless.

In Scotland they have never had it; and yet it is the most intelligent and well governed part of Great Britain. Crime is repressed and rights are protected as well as in any other part of the civilized world; and yet they never had the institution among them. Is it an experiment? Are we all stepping upon untried ground, when in one of the most civilized countries in the world another course has been adopted and proved successful? There the criminals are arrested by the magistrate, the testimony reduced to writing, then sent to the proper law officer, and acted upon; and where is crime more surely detected or justice more certain in its operation?

What or where is the difference? What should make us adopt this machinery of the grand jury? The magistrates are equally intelligent, equally virtuous, equally tenacious of our rights. No more injurious consequences can be apprehended than can be found at present, as regards the safety of the citizen.

Everything reverts back to the argument that it is old and venerable. Sir, it is venerable, but it is a venerable ruin.

I am willing to be rid of it; we can dispense with it. We can preserve our rights equally effectually—crime can be repressed with as much certainty—the rights of the people guarded with as much diligence. Therefore, we can dispense with it.

But I do not wish to put a bar against the restoration of the institution by the people, if they see fit. I shall vote so that they can keep, repeal, or insert a new system, if they choose so to do.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I think it the best plan to leave it to the Legislature, as I am confident that the system, if retained, ought to be modified.

The gentlemen from Kalamazoo [Mr. CLARK] mistook me on one point. I said when a case was thoroughly investigated by a justice of the peace, that I saw no necessity for the case going before a grand jury, for the reason that the case is defended before a magistrate; while before a grand jury the person accused has no defence—it is an ex parte examination. As, however, my motives in offering the amendment have not been appreciated, I withdraw it.

Mr. CORNELL—We have heard very conflicting opinions upon this subject. Some are for entire abolition, some for its retention by a provision in the constitution, while others have wished the matter left to the Legislature. I am in favor of the latter measure, and hope that it will be adopted. I do not doubt that the institution is bad, and has been so for some time. The defenders of the institution admit its defects, but if the institution is abolished they want a substitute. This, sir, is not the proper place to furnish a substitute. At present the working of the system requires a great deal of machinery; but, sir, I would ask, was it made by men or angels? By men; and cannot men make a more simple system? Something can be done, sir; a system can be made and adopted as effectual and more simple.

I am willing to leave the matter to the Legislature, as being the most proper place. If placed in the constitution now, in a few years the people might call for a change. We should leave it open, that it may be changed to the extent that the people demand.

Mr. WALKER—The last gentleman said that the institution is worthless; but because there is a difference of opinion he is willing to leave it to the Legislature. If he is willing to do so upon all questions upon which there may be a difference of opinion, there will be but little left for us to do here. Where is the question, in fact, that has arisen, that would not have compelled him to leave it to the Legislature to do as they choose.

In many of the provisions introduced by the chairman of the legislative department committee, there were differences in relation to many points. Still, having this opinion, he permits provisions to be placed in the constitution, binding upon the legislature; while in this case, he states that the institution is worthless, but is willing, in consideration of the difference of opinion, to permit the evil to remain.

Mr. CORNELL—I did not say so. I said this was not the place to go into detail.

Mr. WALKER—As I before remarked, I have heard no good reason for the continuance of this system. It all seems to rest in the name of grand jury; if they are called grand jurors, it answers perfectly well for the citizen, and makes a sufficient plea for its defence. I would like to know why a man will become a better judge because he is chosen by the assessors of a township; or how a grand jury selected from one hundred men, by being taken out of a box by chance, will be more likely to do justice than a man deliberately selected for the qualifications which he is known to possess. We have discarded the appointing power; we shall refuse to leave it even in the hands of the Executive of the State, as far as practicable; yet you still wish to retain the appointing power in the hands of the assessors, taken by chance, but from a selected number; and by this means obtain a tribunal that cannot err. There is something very singular in the workings of the grand jury system; it still partakes of chance after they are selected. If twenty-three men are sworn, twelve are required to find a bill; if but twelve, the same number must still agree; so that one person disagreeing, will compel the prisoner to be released; if sixteen are sworn, then it requires two-thirds to find a bill. It seems a relic of former times, not adapted to our wants; and for one I should cheerfully wish it to be rescinded.

Mr. WHITE—The subject under discussion is, with me, Mr. President, one of power; and the question as to the exercise of that power of our person or body over that of another, resolves itself in this one proposition: whether we shall or shall not insert in the Bill of Rights a provision declaring that persons shall not be presented for trial until action has been taken by a tribunal which we call a grand jury. That is the question. Whether we shall embody in this article this right, or leave it in the keeping of any justice of the peace. The proposition is to strike from your article a salutary provision, and substitute nothing for it. I am called to surrender this right. Now sir, I am willing that it should be pruned, the expenses retrenched; but I am unwilling to part with the right which has been guaranteed to us for ages; while I am not willing to throw this right upon the caprice of a justice of the peace. I am willing to modify the grand jury system so as to meet the objections which gentlemen have raised to its operations in this State. I am in favor of retaining the power with which grand juries are invested, but I am not willing to leave my right to the mercy of incompetent magistrates; and I think that we should all be unwilling that a man should be tried for a heinous offence, without ascertaining whether there is probable cause or not. The proposition is monstrous; and those who propose this innovation, should first point out the substitute for this venerable institution; it becomes their duty to do so, and not leave it to future legislation.

The gentleman from Washtenaw [Mr. SKINNER] tells us that in the State of Connecticut, for ordinary crimes, no grand juries are called; that in each town three grand jurors are elected, whose business it is to see that all offenders are brought to justice. This proposition, if offered by that gentleman, would commend itself to my mind over all other propositions that I have listened to on this subject; and the gentleman from Calhoun says that he never saw but one grand jury in that State. Does it follow from this argument that it is not a good institution. I should rather infer that it was a most admirable system; that the morals of the people under its operation, had become so pure that they could dispense with it. Until I can find a substitute, I shall be compelled to vote against the abolition of the grand jury.

Mr. WILLIAMS was conscious that the Convention was fatigued and would detain them but a few moments. With due respect to the gentlemen who had in-veighed against the grand jury, he must say that they had treated the subject unfairly. One would suppose that it was an institution organized and used for none but petty and malicious purposes. What are the facts? What duties are enjoined upon it? Let us hear the charge of the court: "You, as grand jurors of this inquest, for the body of this county of _____, do solemnly swear, that you will diligently inquire, and true presentment make of all such matters and things as shall be given you in charge; your own counsel, and the counsel of the people, and of your fellows, you shall keep secret; you shall present no person for envy, hatred or malice, neither shall you leave any person unpresented for love, fear, favor, affection, or hope of reward; but you shall present things truly, as they come to your knowledge, according to the best of your understanding, so help you God." Such are the duties and functions of a grand jury, as defined by our laws—an institution, according to Judge Storey, which affords "a great security to the citizens against vindictive prosecutions, either by the government or political partizans, or by private enemies." Such our laws define it. So learned jurists describe it. It is designed and intended, and under a sound administration, must be only efficient for good.

Its opponents argue only from the abuses, most of them imaginary, practiced under its forms. What invention of man, what gift of Providence, does not contain evil mingled with good? The reverend gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] has been particularly nervous in regard to its abuses, and he was well reminded by the gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] of the abuses practiced under the garb of religion, of which he is a minister. Infidels have always been denounced because they argued only from its abuses. In times past its ministers have been tools and slaves, bigots, hypocrites, tyrants and demagogues. Millions of defenceless people have been butchered in wars engendered by it. Its instruments have been inquisitions and tortures. Yet these abuses are not allowed as of any weight against its value or its truth. The whole administration of the law has always been full of abuses; all kinds of government have been perverted and abused. The inventions of man can all be abused. Steam destroys as well as multiplies the result of labor. The rain that descends to fertilize your lands and cause the earth to yield her abundance, may be accompanied by a shaft that consumes your dwelling; or a tornado that sweeps your fields with desolation!

We are a wise body of men, and each of us fancies that he can make a perfect constitution. We all of us brought constitutions here in our heads, except the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY,] who, according to one of the newspaper scribblers, carries one in his pocket. We are all imbued more or less with the feeling described in four lines of doggerel, which I have somewhere picked up:—

"Of old things, all are over old;
Of new things, none are new enough;
We'll show that we can help to make
A world of better stuff."

The men who destroy the grand jury do not even offer to make "a world of better stuff," or of any stuff at all. They destroy, but do not renovate. They proceed as one of my neighbors once did to excavate his whole cellar, under a building already erected, before he proposed to build up the walls to sustain it.

The proposition to abolish the grand jury by an English judge, if he understood the quotation of the gentlemen from Calhoun, [Mr. J. D. PIERCE,] extended to the metropolitan police district. He would remind the gentleman that that district was protected by an organized police, possessed of terrible energies, using secrecy to ten times the extent that a grand jury ever does, and under whose protection life, liberty and property are safe. In our new States we have no such protection.

During all the discussion relative to this subject, not a single hint has been given as to any adequate substitute which shall protect society against three classes of offences. No method has been proposed for the protection of the defenceless, the son, ward, wife or victim of a person who could hold them in terror, if confronted in open court. No tribunal has been proposed adequate to ferret out a conspiracy, knot by knot, and thread by thread. None has been proposed so adequate to investigate the crimes of a fugitive from justice.

In 1845 the Executive of this State was furnished by the authorities of Illinois with a long catalogue of villains, bound together in one conspiracy, and extending throughout the North-western States, and into Canada. They were criminals of every grade, and were ready for the commission of every crime, and bound to protect each other by any and all means. The gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. CLARK,] has informed me that one of their ramifications extended into his neighborhood. It purported to be a moral society; but when ferreted out, it was found that its members were sworn to protect each other, to procure places even in the jury box, to perjure themselves, or suborn perjurers, and by every desperate deed, break down the barriers of society.

The Executive furnished the list to the several prosecuting attorneys, and by the long, quiet and thorough investigations of grand juries, the offenders were brought to justice, and the conspiracy broken up. Of what use could a weak tribunal, open as day, have been in the investigation of such crimes? The important disclosures, so vital to our citizens, were made before a grand jury of another State. It seems that this institution, so fraught with evil, even when existing in another State, and exercising its functions beyond our jurisdiction, has exercised a beneficial influence over the peace and welfare of our own people, and been productive to us of valuable benefits; whereas the first arrest and open trial of a single criminal would have given instantaneous notice to all the world, and enabled the organized gang to baffle all pursuit, and evade all punishment. While adverting to this fact, that the grand jury of Illinois had aided to protect life, liberty and property in our own State, he would remark that for some cause or other, all the conventions which have recently made new constitutions, have held sacred the grand jury. You will find that it is perpetuated in all the new constitutions of Iowa, Wisconsin, California, Illinois and New York—notwithstanding the assumption that it is hostile to the genius of our institutions.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE offered the following substitute:

"The present grand jury is hereby abolished."

Mr. STOREY moved the previous question; when,

Mr. BAGG moved to adjourn; which was lost.

The previous question was then demanded, but the vote seconding it was reconsidered; and the motion withdrawn.

The question recurring on the substitute offered by Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the same was lost—yeas 29; nays 52.

Mr. WILLIAMS proposed the following amendment to the one offered by Mr. S. CLARK, and the same was accepted by the mover:

Strike out "a criminal offence," and insert "any criminal offence punishable by imprisonment in the State prison."

Mr. WILLIAMS proposed further to amend, by adding to the amendment proposed by Mr. CLARK, "Grand juries may be so modified as not to consist of more than thirteen men;" which did not prevail.

The amendment proposed by Mr. CLARK was then lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Backus, Bagg, J. Clark, S. Clark, Desnoyers, Hanscom, Moore, Raynole, Van Valkenburgh, Wells, White, Williams, Witherell, President—14.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chapel, Choate, Church, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crarry, Daniels, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Leach, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whittemore—69.

Mr. ROBERTS moved that the further consideration of the Article entitled "Bill of Rights," be postponed until all other articles to be acted upon by this Convention, have been considered and disposed of, except the schedule; which,

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, was laid on the table.

The Convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, (19th day,) June 24.

The President called the Convention to order at the usual hour.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PEITITIONS.

By Mr. STOREY: of Geo. F. Gardner and 150 others, citizens of Jackson county, praying that the elective franchise may be extended to every male citizen above the age of 21 years; and also, that the word "white" may be excluded from the constitution, whenever and wheresoever the same may occur to the detriment of the colored citizens of the State of Michigan.

REPORTS.

Mr. COMSTOCK, from a minority of the committee on banking and other incorporations, except municipal, submitted the following report and article:

Report.

The undersigned, minority of the committee to whom was referred the subject of corporations, other than municipal, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report, that on so much of the subject referred as related to banks, the committee could not agree.

In order to secure to the people of this State, under existing circumstances, a sufficiently safe, ready and ample circulating medium to meet the wants of the commercial and business portion of community, a system of banking, founded on a specie paying basis, with ample security for the redemption in specie of all bills put in circulation as money, appears to the undersigned to be absolutely necessary.

And when we take a view of the peninsular State, surrounded as it nearly is by navigable waters, which are continuous to other States, with a coast of more than eighteen hundred miles in extent, lined with fisheries inexhaustible, a fertility of soil unsurpassed in the variety and extent of its productions; bearing on its surface extensive forests of valuable timber, and enriched beneath by natural resources of unlimited mineral wealth, with its mines of iron and copper, its beds of coal and plaster, and salt springs, the conclusion is irresistible that a vast trade must grow up, which will demand an increased corresponding circulating medium.

It is, therefore, the part of wisdom and sound policy, that a system of banking be established that shall induce the aggregation and employment of foreign capital in our State, and shut out from circulation bills of less reliable institutions from other States.

It is the opinion of the committee, that by providing for such a system of banking as we have recommended, that it will be, not only a salutary aid in carrying on the already large and increasing commerce and trade within the State, but that it will prove highly advantageous to every branch of industry, and satisfactory to the people at large.

The committee, therefore, beg leave to report the following Article:

ARTICLE —.

Corporations, other than Municipal.

Sec. 1. Corporations may be formed under general laws; but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes. All general laws, and special acts passed pursuant to this section, may be altered from time to time, or repealed.

Sec. 2. The term "corporations," as used in this article, shall be construed to include all associations and joint stock companies having any of the powers or privileges of corporations, not possessed by individuals or partnerships. And all corporations shall have the right to sue, and shall be subject to be sued, in all courts, in like cases as natural persons.

Sec. 3. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act granting any special charter for banking purposes; but corporations or associations may be formed for such purposes, under general laws, by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to both branches thereof.

Sec. 4. The Legislature shall not pass any law sanctioning in any manner, directly or indirectly, the suspension of specie payments by any person, association or corporation issuing bank notes, of any description.

Sec. 5. The Legislature shall provide by law for the registry of all bills or notes issued or put in circulation as money, and shall require ample security for the redemption of the same in specie; such security to be in stocks, (bonds or evidence of debt issued by the United States or of individual States, or both,) which shall be deposited with the State Treasurer, and be at least, when offered, equal in value to the amount of bills or notes registered and issued for circulation.

Sec. 6. The stockholders in every corporation and joint stock association for banking purposes, issuing bank notes or any kind of paper credits to circulate as money, shall be individually responsible to the amount of their respective share or shares of stock in any such corporation or association, for all its issues, debts and liabilities.

Sec. 7. All corporations and joint stock associations created by the Legislature, under and by virtue of this article, shall pay to the State Treasurer for the use of the State, at least one per centum per annum on the capital stock paid in, as a tax; and no other tax shall be assessed or collected against them.

Sec. 8. In case of the insolvency of any bank or banking association, the bill holders thereof shall be entitled to preference in payment, over all other creditors of said bank or association.

Respectfully submitted.

A. J. COMSTOCK,

J. R. WHITE,

Minority of Com.

The article and report were referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS,

The use of the hall for to-morrow evening was allowed to Messrs. CLARK and SMITH for the purpose of delivering a lecture on scientific subjects.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

The Bill of Rights being under consideration,

Mr. BAGG offered the following, as an additional section to the article:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Mr. CRARY raised a point of order, that the amendment proposed, embraced matter that had been once disposed of by the Convention.

The PRESIDENT decided the amendment in order.

Mr. BAGG said—Mr. President, I should not have obtruded myself upon the Convention at this time, upon the subject under consideration, had not the county of Wayne, which in part I have the honor to represent, from her peculiar local and relative position, a right to be heard upon this floor. Although when I was sent from the city of Detroit as a delegate to this Convention, little was expected of me from my constituents in regard to the judiciary or grand jury system, and therefore, under little or no responsibility, she having sent for that purpose the ex-judges of her courts, and Springwells her able advocate of the law; and as much was expected of the Chief Justice of the State in regard to these legal matters, who would not, I am sure, consider it a dishonor to hail directly from the city of Detroit, it being the city of his nativity—but as we have been disappointed in not hearing from either of these gentlemen, upon the main subject, of this, in my judgment, uncalled for innovation, except from yourself, sir, I feel compelled, by the irresistible force of circumstances, although layman as I am, briefly to give some of the reasons why I shall not vote for abolishing the present grand jury system, and answer some of the assertions of those who occupy the negative of this question. And here let me say, that although I have listened with the most careful attention to all that has been said, in exhortations and declamations by the exponents of this measure, I have found but little to feed or stimulate my argumentative powers to attempt to rebut; but on the contrary, with two or three exceptions, all, from first to last, who have favored us upon the negative, have only contributed to inundate us with a mass of incongruities, based upon their impressions, experience and imagination, instead of argument. Sir, had Ruth, of old, gleaning in the fields of Boaz for corn for her hungry relatives, met with no better success for food, to satisfy the cravings of nature, than have the friends of this amendment for arguments, from their opponents, she would have retired at once in disgust and discouragement and never again have repeated her labors. Therefore, sir, should I utterly and completely fail, at this time, from indisposition, want of memory, capacity, or concentration, to show up the absurdities, incongruities and inconsistencies dragged into this debate, I shall have at least one sweet consolation left, to wit: that of being on a par with every gentleman who has preceded me, in opposition, in debate upon this subject. Before entering upon the subject in controversy, let me thank the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. CLARK,] and the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] on behalf of myself and my constituents, for the part they have taken in this debate; for their unwearied exertions against this uncalled for innovation. The gentleman from Kalamazoo, who opened the debate, laid down his premises so methodically logical, and so clearly and orderly brought forth his arguments to sustain them, that those who run might read, understand and appreciate; and in my humble estimation nothing could prevent a conviction of the truth of his proposition, but an obstructed vision, through the jaundiced eye of prejudice, or the more perfect obstruction of self interest. I know not which most to admire and commend, the matter or the manner in which it was delivered—the latter being sufficiently slow, calm and deliberative, to be understood. The gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] who spoke near the close of the debate, (and here let me say towards whom, at this time, I have no very good feeling,) made one of the very best speeches that has been made on this floor on this or any other subject in this Convention. Sir, the gentleman stole my speech, and completely took the wind out of my sails, and forced me to lay over.

This sir, is the cause of my ill feeling, personally, towards him at this time; and so sure as it is again repeated, and I can catch him at the Isle of Mackinac, I will surely challenge him or obtain an indictment against him before the substituted court of that Isle, to show probable cause why the modified Lynch code put in use by the gentleman of Mackinac, while prosecuting attorney of that isolated upper region, should not be enforced against him. Although there is this unpleasant feeling between us, I here tender him my thanks and that of my constituents. The masterly manner in which he proceeded to analyze the whole bundle of incongruities thrown in upon this subject, and scattered to the four winds of heaven, cannot be beat on this floor. And now, sir, I propose to simply touch upon the assertions, experience, and sometimes shade of argument, of the various gentlemen who have spoken in opposition, somewhat, but not altogether inversely, in the order in which they addressed the committee and the Convention. To dispose of a brace of these gentlemen, in a summary manner, so as not to tire the patience of the Convention, and at the same time, in proportion to their relative and antagonizing merits, with regard to each other on this subject, I propose to examine the reverend and venerated gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. PIERCE,] with the legal gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. BARTOW.] While the former tells us that the grand jury system is an inquisition allied to that of old Spain, and a relic of monarchy, handed down to us from Great Britain, and is directly in effect contrary to the spirit and genius of our democratic institutions, and endeavors to excite the ultra democracy on this floor, by an appeal to their passions and prejudices, with a tact peculiar to himself, (and his main general weapon,) and thereby carry the question by storm, by a kind of artificial tornado, instead of convincing the judgment; the latter tells us that in Scotland they have never had grand juries; that that aristocratic and law loving people get along swimmingly without them; and that they are the most free from crime of any other nation under heaven. While the former gentleman tells us that even in Great Britain they are about to abolish the grand jury system, and reads a law novel or law magazine published in London, to prove that one man during the last century has had sufficient imagination to propose the innovation there, the latter tells us that here it cannot constitutionally be abolished, and reads in his place the constitution of the United States to prove it. These gentlemen being thus antagonized in a measure, and not knowing whether the gentleman from Genesee has a "Mo" to his name, and his not condescending to tell us whether Great Britain belonged to Scotland or the "rest of mankind," and not being attracted to any argument in particular from either gentleman, I leave them thus antagonized, as the Paddy did the Kilkenny cats—to swallow up each other at their leisure.

The junior member from Macomb, [Mr.

ROBERTSON,] tells us that public sentiment in Macomb county calls loudly for the abolition of the grand jury system; and to prove it, points us to a meeting in one single school district in that county, and of their expression to this Convention by petition. Now, sir, it is very easy to get up meetings on any subject in any county in the State; and whether this meeting of old democratic Macomb originated from this Convention, or was the result of spontaneous combustion at home, is immaterial at this time, as it is but one item in one single school district in one town, in one county of the State—but one ingredient in the composition of that omnipotent public sentiment of the whole, spoken of by the gentleman. This meeting and their petition, coupled with the expression of one solitary individual in the county of Wayne, who was much displeased to find himself thwarted in attempting to obtain an indictment against a certain individual, from vindictive feelings of ill will, by the grand jury of Wayne, is the only expression I have ever heard against the grand jury system, except upon this floor.

But, says the gentleman, "a single justice of the peace would be cheaper—much less expensive, and make a good substitute for the grand jury." Now, sir, so far as the county of Wayne is concerned, and has been for the last five years, the reverse is true. Says the gentleman, "almost every one that is held to bail, or recognized to appear before the grand jury, by a justice of the peace, is sure to become indicted, and therefore you might as well substitute a justice of the peace, and let them do the whole business at once." In the county of Wayne, during the last five years, not one-third of all those who are recognized to appear, by justices of the peace, are ever indicted. This, coupled with the same statistics of Oakland, stated by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] would prove the gentleman in this matter utterly mistaken; for Oakland, and Wayne county combined, or taken together in the aggregate, have sent, since 1839, more criminals to the Penitentiary than the whole State besides, put together. Not one-third, then, of all those who are recognized to appear are ever indicted, and in the county of Wayne, those that are indicted are almost certain to be convicted. For years it has been proverbial with us, that an indictment before a grand jury would be tantamount to a conviction, which speaks loudly, not only in favor of the grand jury, but our Prosecuting Attorneys and Judges. Sir, two-thirds of all those who are held by justices of the peace to appear before the grand jury for probable cause, are never indicted, but remain on file in your clerk's offices, as so many monuments of cupidity and want of knowledge, only to be hauled over the next three months by the justice and constable interested, to base a bill of fees, before the Auditors, which amounts to from fifty to one hundred and fifty dollars per quarter, each. I appeal sir, for the correctness of this statement, to yourself, sir, Judge Witherell, ex-auditor Fralick, and the present auditor, Brown, now in his seat upon this floor. I find, also, sir, from statistics of our State Prison, published recently in the Jackson Citizen, that the county of Wayne, owing to the city of Detroit, her great commercial centre, being situated on the range of the great Lakes, its contiguity to Canada, and other causes, has sent, since 1839, two hundred and forty-five convicts; while the whole State besides has sent but two hundred and fifty-three. I also find that of this last number, Livingston has sent but one, while Cass has sent eight, and Macomb but seven convicts in that time. These statistics of Macomb, taken in connection with the duration of time that the gentleman has been admitted to the bar, (four years) together with the great number of convicts sent to the Penitentiary since 1839, not quite two-thirds of a convict per year, verily, verily shows that the gentleman's experience in criminal matters and grand jury systems, must be very extensive indeed, and have its proportional weight upon this Convention.

The senior member of the bar from Macomb, [Mr. WALKER,] when he arose to speak, so soon run into collision with my friend from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] who could not screw himself up to so high a pitch of boldness as the gentleman, as to abolish the grand jury, for fear of endangering the constitution before the people; and who was not disposed to be lectured on that account from Macomb, seemed to forget his argument in this collision, and as there is an adjourned veracity yet remaining between them, and as it was well known that the gentleman had a fit of fever and ague on that day, and as what he did advance showed him to be in the cold fit, out of benevolence, I leave him without further comment.

The gentleman from Ingham [Mr. BUSH] is in favor of abolishing the present grand jury system. If I mistake not, he tells us that, although since 1839 the county of Livingston has sent but one criminal to the penitentiary, their criminal courts have cost ten thousand dollars in that period. This looks at the first blush as though there was rottenness in Denmark somewhere, I confess; but does it argue against the grand jury system? In truth, without facts in detail, would it not go to show, as there was but one conviction, that the great amount of cost was owing to the great number returned by justices of the peace, who were proven before the grand jury innocent? If so, would it not be a direct argument against the substitution of a justice of the peace instead of the grand jury, as proposed by the opponents of the grand jury system; and a direct argument in favor of the latter?

The gentleman's main argument against the grand jury is its great expense. Have the gentlemen proposed anything cheaper, to say nothing of its efficiency? Sir, tribunals for justice, where crime on the one hand is to be considered, and innocence on the other protected, must necessarily cost something; although the other day the gentleman from St. Joseph showed conclusively from statistics which he exhibited, that grand juries throughout the State would cost but little more than three cents per head for every taxable inhabitant, about the price of one paper of tobacco of Mrs. Miller's best, and yet the great cost is here constantly harped upon. The expense of tribunals for justice is very much allied in nature with certain other necessary expenses for our existence. I have often remarked to my friends that it was a great pity that life was a forced state of existence, and that it was necessary for us to constantly eat and drink, and clothe ourselves against the assaults of the elements, or we should die. Were this not the case, we could all get rich. So, also, with tribunals of justice. So long as crimes are committed they must be ferreted out and punished, cost what they may.

The gentleman from Lenawee [Mr. TIFFANY] is also in this crusade against the grand jury. He, however, shows his prudence in leaving it to the Legislature, fearing, should we here abolish it, it might endanger the constitution itself, before the people themselves. Wise thought! I think, as I know something of judges and juries, and their relative action and duties with each other, I can enter into and appreciate his feelings on this subject. We know that in long contested civil and criminal cases, after a righteous judge has patiently superintended for days the gudgeons of law, and the testimony has been given to the jury, the case summed up by the counsel on either side, and the judge has pointedly charged them how to bring in their verdict, some juries, throwing themselves from self esteem upon their dignity, consequence and reserved rights, believing that in this country a jury stands above every other court under Heaven—that theirs being the peculiar duty to judge of the facts in the case, the immutable principles of truth, while that of the judge being merely to see that justice is judicially administered—have refused to bring in a verdict as directly or indirectly directed, which has contributed not a little to exasperate the feelings of the court; and by repeated acts of such independent insubordination, some judges have come to the determination that juries of all kinds are nothing but forces, and should be dispensed with. Thus the one horse or one man power has, from these repeated acts of aggression on their part, been growing, until many old and even righteous judges have come to the conclusion that they can do all the business in the most satisfactory manner themselves, without the assistance of these independent interlopers between the law and the facts. If this can be done, certainly it is much the cheapest, and can be accomplished much the quickest. At least it will remove the ill feelings arising from a difference in judgment; and judgment will of course be sooner dispensed, right or wrong; and as to certainty, it is all wise and convenient, for the judge would be sure to agree with himself, and declare his judgment with great unanimity and self complacency.

The gentleman from Cass, [Mr. SULLIVAN] in whose judgment on general subjects I have the highest confidence, objects to the grand jury system because it is too secret, and at the same time too open; that it is secret in what it should not be, and open when it should be secret. Now, for the life of me, I cannot see the distinction he would here wish to inculcate. I have no other means, nor has the gentleman, to judge of the duties and action of a grand jury, but the oath they take before their duties commence, which the gentleman from St. Joseph read to the Convention on Saturday, in his place. By that oath they are bound to keep secret the counsel of their fellows, and that of the State or people, between whom and the accused they are bound to judge. They are sworn to diligently inquire and true presentment make of all such matters and things as shall be given them in charge. They are sworn to present no person for envy, hatred, malice, anger or revenge. Neither are they to leave any person unpresented through fear, favor, affection, or the hope of reward; but they are to present things truly, as they come to their knowledge, according their best understanding. By statute, any one held to answer for a criminal offence may object to the competency of a grand juror.

The grand jurors are returned from the body of the whole county, to the clerk's office by the assessors, under oath. By statute they are bound to present all persons they know to be guilty of crimes and misdemeanors. They are also to look into all nuisances; and attend to the interest of the school lands. Now sir, if the grand jury live up to their oaths, is there any wrong about it? Is there anything wrong about the oath? Did the gentleman from Cass wish to be understood to mean to say, that the great majority of the grand juries in this State disregard and forfeit their oaths? violate and expose the secrets of their fellow-jurors, or of the State? I presume not. What then does he mean? If he mean that in a court of inquiry for probable cause, which the gentleman acknowledges to be necessary in this State, the said court or jury should not be secret in its investigations, he is much mistaken; for until it be shown that crimes are all committed openly, in the light of day, it cannot be shown that the tribunal or inquiry should not be secret. All causes of crime, and their remedies, stand in relation of cause and effect to each other. They are therefore inseparable in their nature; one must correspond with the other. Who does not know that nine-tenths of all the crimes committed in any state or country, are perpetrated in secret. Therefore, the inquiry for probable cause must be secret, which is the remedy. Does not, then, the gentleman see and know, from the very nature of the case, they must be secret? Why sir, for centuries long since, these things, these principles, have been universally known and understood, and long since passed into a proverb as old as the Jewish law itself, and become a maxim and an axiom, that they stand in relation to each other as cause and effect. It is based upon the general principle, that like causes produce like effects under the same circumstances, on the doctrine of modern Homœopathy, similia similibus, like to like. "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," says the great law-giver; "meet a fool in proportion to his folly," &c., &c. These old sayings are founded in philosophy, are true to the letter, and have been inculcated and practiced upon for ages, in the administration of justice throughout the civilized world.

But, says the gentleman from Cass, the grand jury as now constituted, is too large; so much so, that there is not sufficient feeling of responsibility. Diminish the number, and you increase the responsibility of the jurors. If this be true, why does the gentleman stop at the number three, his favorite number, as a substitute, coupled with a prosecuting attorney? If you increase the responsibility in direct ratio to the diminution of numbers, why not diminish to one simple justice of the peace, instead of three, and unite with the junior member of the bar, in judgment, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] from Macomb. It would be exceedingly gratifying to have at least two of these gentlemen, opponents of the grand jury system, agree on one point in their substitute. It has ever been my judgment that the number might be safely diminished to perhaps thirteen, instead of the present number, twenty-three; but to abolish the whole system at this time, or any other, is unwise and imprudent, and will work manifestly injurious to all, the innocent and the guilty.

There was one argument which fell from the gentleman, which strikes me was ill-timed, and might have been avoided; I allude to the comparison instituted or made on this floor, between Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world, and the ultra democracy on this floor, who go for the abolition of the grand jury system. Thus endeavoring to show, by comparison, that as He was the Savior of the World, and came on earth to destroy systems, and thereby benefit mankind, these little Lilliputian saviors of the State, would destroy the grand jury, and correspondingly benefit the State. Now, although I am not so well versed in scripture as some, what little I have read, I understand quite differently. I have yet to learn in the New Testament, that the Redeemer showed large manifestations of destructiveness; but on the contrary, his whole life was characterized by mildness, meekness and humility. He says, "He came not even to judge, but to save;" much less I apprehend to destroy. True, he came to destroy the curses of sin, crime and iniquity, not the tribunals of justice—the tribunals or courts to ferret out crimes, misdemeanors and iniquities. No such thing. My St. Paul teaches no such thing as the great destructiveness of the Savior of the world; and these reformers, associated with the gentleman, are welcome to all they arrogate to themselves for the comparison.

And now, in regard to the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. SKINNER.] He is, emphatically one of the noblest works of God—an honest man—and speaks without restraint from the abundance of the heart. He tells us that he is against all juries; that he cares nothing about public sentiment; that he is prepared to abolish the grand jury system at once, here, and not wait for the legislature to do it. We possess, says he, sufficient knowledge to know that the grand jury has no intrinsic merits, and therefore should be abolished at once, &c. I hardly know, sir, which to admire most, his honesty, frankness, or boldness, on this question; and as I knew him to be a lawyer, I waited with no little patience while listening to him, for a refreshing shower of argument, after the dearth we had endured from his colleagues on the same side, but waited in vain. But, notwithstanding this want of argument, he cleared up one obscured point so clearly, that never was a hazy atmosphere by a clap of thunder rendered more so. I allude to the reason for the abolition of the grand jury at this time, which the other gentlemen, by their masked batteries, had entirely eluded. The gentleman says that the great reason why he wishes to abolish it is, that they, the ultra reformers, can institute district courts in every town in the State, and mean so to do. For this, sir, I am much obliged, as it gives us the key which unlocks this whole mystery.

Yes sir, the grand jury which has stood for ages as a monument of wisdom and intelligence, must go by the board, and for what? Simply, that although we are at the noon-day of the nineteenth century, in the full tide of progressive intelligence—yea, progressive democracy—with our steamboats crossing the Atlantic in ten days, and our electric telegraph binding the whole nation in one intellect, momentarily, to take our back track, retrograde, and go back to at least two hundred years of ignorance, to the days of the feudal system, and institute and create in every town, and for aught I know, in every sap bush, little pie poudre courts, or courts leet, where the pig and his master may go down to court together, and obtain a writ of error, and justice, from the nipple.

Sir, there absolutely seems to be a disposition in this body, by law, yes, by constitutional enactment, to analyze the civil, municipal and social communities and circles, and to reduce them to their elements, to reduce them to chaos, and that the first step is to prostrate the judiciary. Before we leave this body, I should not be surprised to see a supervisor of a town created, by constitutional enactment, lord high chancellor, and a justice of the peace a circuit judge, ex officio, and every constable high sheriff. I confess when I came here I was not prepared to see this acknowledged progressive intelligence taking that contrary direction, but await the result with composure.

And now, sir, I pay my respects to the gentleman from Mackinac, [Mr. McLEOD.] And here let me say at the onset, that when the gentleman commenced his speech, he brought to my mind the story told of a President of one of our eastern colleges. The professor had received from a southern planter his son to educate. The planter told him to spare no pains, as the price of tuition was no consideration. He wished him to teach him above all other arts and sciences, rhetoric, logic and eloquence, and be sure and make him a good speaker. The professor accordingly, in addition to his public studies, daily trained him in private. One day, while the student was in the full tide of successful experiment, soaring aloft into the sublime, and then, like the swallow, dipping down into the ridiculous, the professor, looking on, and with a stamp of the foot, cried out, "stop sir! let me tell you something that will at all times be of service to you while speaking in public, in all places, on all subjects, and under any condition." The student gazed with wonder in anticipation. Said the professor, "when you open your mouth to speak, be sure you never open it so wide but that you can shut it again!" When the gentleman commenced and told us that the Isle of Mackinac was like what the Kentucky bully said of his State—"bounded on the north by the aurora borealis, on the east by the rising sun, on the south by illimitable space, and on the west by the day of judgment;" I confess, being somewhat of an impressible, I was caught up in the spirit of imagination of the speaker, and followed him aloft into the airy upper regions of fancy until I almost forgot earth. To be sure, I faintly remember some indistinct rumbling here below, and muttering about these seats, but only come to myself when the gentleman, in his lead, again landed me on the Isle of Mackinac, by telling us that he had been prosecuting attorney there for years, and that, in his judgment, the grand jury should be abolished. "For," says he, "at one time, owing to the penurious feelings of the clerk, judge and sheriff, they would not order or draw a grand jury, and I determined they should be tried, (some half dozen of culprits.) I modified the lynch code, put them through and sent the poor devils to the penitentiary." Therefore, the gentleman inferred from this operation at that island, that the grand jury was useless, as a justice of the peace and prosecuting attorney might form a good modified lynch substitute. I confess, when the gentleman had got thus far, I began to query with myself whether Mackinac was even bounded on either side by the day of judgment, or at least, by the day of good judgment.

We, however, are indebted to the gentleman from Mackinac, and to no other man of the opposition, for the acknowledgment that it is necessary for some court or tribunal to inquire into the condition of the accused, whether there be probable cause, before he is put before the traverse jury upon his defence; and here the gentleman, with his colleagues, seem to occupy rather, to me, an inconsistent and awkward position. I think the whole of them, without an exception, for I would not misstate any man on this floor, voted in the Bill of Rights for a section guaranteeing in all civil cases, where nothing but dollars and cents were concerned, a common law jury; but when they come to the grand jury, where crime and innocence are concerned—crime, on the one hand, ferreted out, and innocence, on the other, protected—they are all thrown into spasms for fear of the expense, harp about ex parte tribunals, relics of English nobility, inquisitions, and what not, and the great secrecy attendant upon the grand jury.

But, says the gentleman, the grand jury is notoriously known to be one of the greatest engines of destruction to character known to the country—a kind of patent machine for blasting and blackening the character of any man, in the most adroit, summary and severe manner. Why, said he, “so notoriously is this the case at Mackinac, that a certain resident politician, who had standing in his way an honorable competitor, and wishing to remove him without the sphere of his ambition, came to me while I was prosecuting attorney, after he had invented and matured his diabolical plan of destruction, with black malice in his heart, and unbosomed himself and wished me to get him simply indicted, and let it hang over him, as the most effectual way to dispose of him.” Who were to be the witnesses, the gentleman did not inform us. But mark again: when this political friend had concocted his accursed plan, and was ready to carry it into execution, who was the very first man he dared to divulge to, and associate with himself in the damnable deed!! Was it not a prosecuting attorney? What other man on earth dare he unbosom himself to on so black and disgraceful a subject? And yet this same officer, a prosecuting attorney, is the very man proposed by the gentleman and his colleagues, united with, oftentimes, an impressible linsey woolsey justice of the peace, as a substitute for the grand jury system now in existence!! The gentleman says he refused this time, and, of course, did not modify the lynch code! How fortunate for the cause of humanity, and the honorable competitor sought to be destroyed, that the office of prosecuting attorney was filled at that time by a man so conscientious! so virtuous!! and so much above suspicion!!! Why, Cæsar’s wife would at once sink into insignificance in comparison with the gentleman on the score of integrity and suspicion. But, from the modified lynch code, while prosecuting attorney, added to the propensity of some of the politicians of that isle, from the gentleman’s own showing, to rid themselves of their political competitors, that with such a substitute as proposed for a grand jury, although bounded on one side by the day of judgment, yet justice in that island might in vain loiter on a line drawn parallel with eternity, before it would ever overtake its object.

Thanking the Convention for the patience with which they have listened to what I have had to say, I have done.

Mr. ALVORD—My colleague and professional brother, says he has received several letters from his constituents, in reference to this question. As he has not enlightened us, I would ask from whom he received those letters? He [Mr. A.] did not believe that any of the delegates from Wayne were instructed, or could tell what was the public sentiment of Wayne county on the subject. It had not been much agitated there. For any thing he knew, a majority might be in favor of abolishing the grand jury system, or they might not. Not knowing their views or wishes, he felt called upon to act according to his own judgment. He had been of the opinion that the grand jury system was a useless, cumbersome and expensive system. That some system might be adopted less cumbersome; that the ends of justice might be met by some other system better adapted to the wants of the community. Not knowing what the wishes of his constituents or the wishes of the people of the State were, he was disposed to leave it entirely open for the action of the legislature.

Mr. A. said the gentleman has endeavored to manufacture opinion for Wayne county. He is the only person who has received any communication on the subject from Wayne; and he has communicated with none other of his colleagues. They do not know from whom he has received the letters. He has got the light, and leaves us to go it blind. He [Mr. A.] protested against that course. If the gentleman has got instructions, and is in possession of the wishes of his constituents, he ought to show them.

Mr. A. concluded by offering an amendment: "and the institution of the grand jury is hereby abolished."

Mr. McLEOD remarked that he had listened with uncommon satisfaction to the remarks of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG.] He [Mr. McLEOD] supposed that the effect produced on him by the miscellaneous harangue of Mr. BAGG, was different from the effect produced on the other delegates; for he was free to confess that there was enough of the old Highland blood coursing in his veins, to make it agreeable to him to hear the shrill squeaking of the Bagg-pipes. He [Mr. McLEOD] had not risen to make a serious reply to the extravagances of his friend over the way; for, to tell the truth, the most of it was as unintelligible as a little treatise which he had once read, and which he believed was entitled "Bagg on the Magnetism of Bullfrogs." His only object in rising was, to assure the delegate that he had entirely convinced him that the most appropriate receptacle for worthless miscellanies was neither more nor less than an old bag.

Mr. MOORE was desirous of coming to a final conclusion on the subject. He had supposed a conclusion had been come to on Saturday. He was sorry to see it opened again; it might be amusing, but it would cost too much.

Mr. N. PIERCE had become more and more convinced by the arguments of gentlemen, that the grand jury should be abolished. The best evidence he had, was that those who advocated it would reduce it one-half. It was universally allowed to be a bad principle; tedious, and not productive of good. It appeared to him there was no reason rendered for sustaining it. But he supposed the Convention had come to the conclusion not to abolish it, and he did not know but that was the best. Every person was in favor of altering it; which showed they had lost confidence in it. But he had expected the question was settled, as he believed every view of it had been illustrated.

Mr. BAGG (by Mr. ALVORD's consent) withdrew his proposed amendment.

Mr. BEARDSLEY offered the following amendment to section 10:

Strike out all after the word "favor," in the 4th line of said section, and in lieu thereof insert as follows, viz: "To be aided by counsel in his defence, who shall have the right to close the argument to the jury, when one may be empannelled."

Mr. B. said he offered the amendment for the purpose of carrying out the humane doctrine of the law; that a person shall, under all circumstances, have the advantage of relieving himself from accusation which shall bring infamy or disgrace upon him, or deprive him of life or liberty. Prejudices always arise against a man accused of crime, in the community. We observe in society every day, that a mere slander is received with avidity; that it is increased little by little, till the individual is prostrated in the opinion of those who would have defended him, if they had known the circumstances. We know when an outrage is committed in society, prejudice takes hold of the public mind; people do not stop to consider whether the person incarcerated is the guilty one or not. It is taken for granted by the public that he is guilty. The jury is a part of that public, who are appointed to try him.

The object in offering the amendment was for the purpose of destroying that influence that argument has on a prejudiced jury. The counsel for the government has the reply. A prejudiced jury requires very little argument to support their prejudices. This prejudice may be corrected by fair and honest argument for the accused; but the counsel for the government has the reply; and by sophistical argument he may renew those prejudices. The object is to give the prisoner the benefit of the argument of the counsel. It is a principle engrafted in the law, that it is better to acquit ten guilty men, than convict one innocent person. History tells us, it is not an uncommon thing for persons to be convicted of crimes they never committed. If we engraft this in the constitution, some guilty person may escape; but it would be better that some should escape, than that one should suffer unjustly from the opposite rule. It may be said that a person accused of crime has equal advantages with persons in civil causes decided by a jury. But I say, till all prejudice is removed, he will not stand on the same footing as in civil cases.

Mr. WITHERELL remarked that he had some experience in matters of this kind. When in the legislature, he had introduced a provision to modify the practice on the subject.

Mr. W. explained the detail of proceedings in criminal cases, and expressed his opinion that if the amendment were adopted, and it should become the practice in our courts, persons guilty of crime would go unwhipped of justice. In cases where a large number of witnesses have been examined, it would operate almost to a certainty in the acquittal of the accused. The defendant's counsel would be able to mystify the evidence so as to excite doubts in the minds of the jury. The duty of counsel for the prosecution is not to proceed in a passionate and persecuting manner, but with coolness and candor. The court, by the rules of common law, is counsel for the prisoner.

Mr. W. referred to the practice in the criminal courts in former times. Those had been greatly modified in favor of the accused. We have gone still further, and he did not see how we could go further than we have done. We are all alike concerned to see public justice administered, and we should not allow our sympathies to go so far as to provide the means of escape for the guilty. The practice we have had justifies the belief that the present mode is sufficient for the purposes of justice, and that it would be dangerous to introduce in the constitution the principle embraced in the amendment proposed.

Mr. HANSCOM said the experience of the gentleman last up, [Mr. WITHERELL,] gave his opinions great weight; but his practice may have created a sort of love and veneration for this mode of proceeding. He had listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Eaton, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] and they seemed to him to have some force, as applied to persons accused of crime. The gentleman from Wayne says, in government prosecutions, it is the duty of the officer to proceed with candor and coolness; to be in some way counsel for both sides; but practically they take the course as if it were the case of a private person. Prosecuting attorneys are usually selected with reference to their ability and standing at the bar; and this is another reason why this proposition should be sustained.

A charge is made, public opinion formed, and, ten to one, public opinion considers the person charged with crime, guilty. An indictment is found; then the prosecuting officer comes before the traverse jury, opens the case, and presents the strongest case he can, fixing the minds of the jury with the conviction that the party is guilty. After the evidence is gone through with, he closes the argument. His ingenuity is always exercised against the defendant. It is wrong, and we cling to it as we do to the grand jury system; because it is antiquated. Does not common humanity require that the prisoner should have the last reply? This is not new. In Mississippi it is their fixed system, and perhaps it is the practice in other States.

Mr. H. said we have got rid, practically, of the grand jury. We leave it to the legislature, and we have no doubt it will be done. If so, this must be adopted. If the prisoner is left to the dictum of a magistrate or prosecuting attorney, he should have this privilege.

Mr. McLEOD stated the course of proceedings in criminal cases, and expressed his opinion that in this country sufficient guards were thrown around for the protection of the accused. He has a jury of the vicinage; is confronted with the witnesses, and can make them undergo a rigid cross examination. After the judge has stripped the whole case of all extraneous influence, and presented it on its naked merits, if convicted, he has the advantage of a writ of error or certiorari, and a new trial in case new evidence can be produced. The argument of the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] is, that the prosecuting officer has the advantage, the other not knowing what would be produced; but that must also be the case with the prosecuting officer. They are both in the same situation.

Mr. CHURCH—Mr. President: The argument which we have just heard from the Hon. delegate from Mackinac, is not indicative of that clear-headedness which he generally exhibits to such a striking degree. He confounds, I think, the exhibition of the evidence in a criminal case to the jury, with the arguments of counsel. There is that difference between them which should be observed in the discussion of this amendment, and which will enable us to decide correctly in the matter. The evidence in the case is submitted in this wise: First, the counsel for the prosecution presents before the jury that testimony which in his opinion makes out a case—a prima facie case; then the counsel for the respondent presents the testimony constituting the defence; then the counsel for the prosecution introduces testimony, in explanation of, or in rebuttal of the testimony of the defence—what is commonly called “rebutting testimony.” That is all right, proper and natural. Now it is proposed that when the argument is taken up, the prosecution should first address the jury, and that the respondent’s counsel should then follow in answer; which should be the end of the matter. This strikes me as the best course. First, there is a saving of time; of which, now, in the trial of such a case, there is too great a consumption. Such a case, I say, sir, generally excites much feeling, and generally involves a large number of facts and circumstances, the discussion of which covers a wide ground. There are now three arguments of counsel, and often more, when more than two counsel are employed. There is no necessity for more than two arguments, when they are to be followed by the charge of an able and impartial judge. The last argument, when pressed with zeal and power upon a jury, must have a strong, a paramount influence. Is it not the dictate of humanity that the benefit of it should be given to the respondent? What harm it may do in the way of the proper administration of justice, the charge of the judge will correct. He will place a rational and clear view of the subject between the rights of the State and the impassioned appeals of the respon-dent’s counsel. No State, no prosecution, no constituted authorities, ask for, or should ask for, the conviction of a respondent, unless his guilt be clear. Of all reasonable doubt he may avail himself. Just so, if there be any advantage in the closing argument, if it gives another chance to the respondent for an acquittal, I am inclined to say, let him enjoy it. In the words of the old court form, “God grant him a safe deliverance.”

Sir, I have not much considered this subject; but I find that, like many other propositions of the delegate from Eaton, it seems to deserve the attention of this body the more it is considered. But I feel inclined to yield to the instincts of humanity where I am not guided by the deductions of reason; and in nine cases out of ten, when upon a subject matter like this we are merciful, we are also just.

This section ten, sir, has not, I fear, been noticed by this Convention as it should be. It is pregnant with instruction. It is the record, in every line and sentence, of the triumphs of reform; it embodies in every clause a right wrested from tyrannic governments and from equally tyrannical courts. By the deprivation of the privileges in this section proclaimed, and by it maintained as constitutional privileges, men of genius, patriotism, and distinguished public service, have been laid upon the scaffold. I could review the history of past years—I could evoke from the State Trials of England instruction and warning of the most momentous and impressive character upon this topic. I shall support, sir, the amendment of the delegate from Eaton.

Mr. WALKER would inquire: suppose we propose this as the authority of the law—the prosecuting officer makes his argument on legal authorities—when the other answers he produces his authorities; shall the prosecuting officer be cut off from answering to those legal arguments?

Mr. McLEOD—One thing I would observe. When a person is put on trial it is presumed he is not guilty; he has the benefit of that presumption, and it is continued till he is proved guilty. The prosecuting officer comes in to show that he is guilty; then comes in the defendant and comments on the statement of the prosecuting officer. It seems fair that he should have an opportunity of commenting on the statement of the defendant. If he introduces new matter the other will have a right to reply.

Mr. CORNELL—It may be considered presumptuous in me, not being a lawyer, that I should interfere on this subject. I have to say but a few words. I respect the opinions of the gentleman from Mackinac, [Mr. McLEOD.] I admire his towering intellect and his honest heart, but I think in this case he argues from incorrect premises. He says the accused stands as innocent until convicted by a jury; but that is not the case in which he stands with the community. If he is indicted, or if he is brought before a magistrate, he is tried at every fire side, and on the statements made, considered guilty. These are the facts—in the eyes of the law he is considered innocent, but in the community guilty.

Mr. WITHERELL thought the practice in Mississippi not a good precedent; there the bowie knife and the revolver settle the law. When a defendant is brought into court, the law presumes him to be innocent; the jury are always told so; that they have a right to consider him innocent until proved guilty. But many a man has been acquitted and gone unwhipped of justice when many believed him guilty, because of some legal doubt. It is difficult to convict the innocent; though there may have been cases, and must be, from the nature of things and from the nature of man, where the innocent have suffered. Yet, who can point to one conviction for the hundreds and thousands that escape on the principle that a man must be acquitted if any legal doubt exists.

In the English courts, in cases of murder or arson, till within the last fifteen years, counsel were not permitted to speak in favor of the accused. They could sit at the bar and marshal the witnesses, but they could not plead. In that case the counsel for the government felt himself more disposed to go into defence, and the judge still more so, than if the prisoner had counsel to defend him.

When a jury is empanelled, do they look to see whether a man is guilty or innocent? No sir. They look to the government to show the guilt. If a doubt exists in the minds of the jury, they must acquit him. This was the practice in the English courts; but we have changed our mode, and I think (said Mr. W.) we have gone far enough. Before a person is convicted we must look at the facts. Men may have a general impression if a man is accused that he is guilty; but who ever goes as a juror into court, except in cases of great excitement, with such prejudices? If they do, they must be discharged. The prisoner has a right to challenge, and reject a certain number without showing cause, and others for cause. He may examine them on oath, whether they have any prejudice; and if so, they are rejected. He can choose his own judges, and must be acquitted, if not proved guilty.

Mr. HANSCOM—The last argument of the gentleman is, that many of the most atrocious criminals would escape, if the counsel for the defendant has the last word. It cuts both ways. We want that the influence of counsel shall not be brought to bear altogether against the accused, but that he may have equally the benefit of it in his defence.

Mr. WHIPPLE did not think that the question had been fairly stated. It was merely a question of practice in the courts, and the first point he would make was this: Whether it would be consistent with propriety to incorporate this rule in the constitution of the State; or, as mere practice, it should be left to the Legislature or the courts to regulate?

He [Mr. W.] had never seen a court that had not protected sufficiently the right of the accused, when placed at the bar. The practice of the courts is this: It is the duty of the prosecuting officer to state the evidence he has to adduce to convict the prisoner. Immediately after this it is the right of the counsel for the prisoner to state his case to the jury. This is the practice in some courts.

It has been assumed that the counsel made statements of the case which prejudiced the accused; but if the counsel for the defence wishes to state the case of his client, he may do so. It has always been considered that in the eye of the law the accused had the benefit of being considered innocent until convicted under the verdict of a jury. The gentleman from Jackson [Mr. CORNELL] says the fact is not so? The opinion of the gentleman from Jackson is not in accordance with my experience. What does the counsel do? He shows all to establish the guilt of the prisoner. If the counsel for the prisoner does not think proper to make his statement, the prosecuting attorney goes on to produce his evidence, and evidence is brought in for the defence. What is the case then? All the evidence is gone through. Has the prosecutor no further rights? Certainly he has. It is simply to rebut the testimony on the part of the prisoner. The evidence is then closed; that is the end of the case, as a matter of order. He believed such to be the most correct mode, as tending most to subserve the ends of justice.

Mr. CHAPEL was opposed to placing this provision in the constitution. Courts and judges made their rules, independent of legislative action. He was in favor of the bill as it stood, as there was all in it that was necessary. He was opposed to spending the time of the Convention in prescribing rules for the courts.

Mr. TIFFANY—The practice of courts and the rules adopted were to subserve the public interests. When they do not, the court can change them. There would be a great risk in taking away from the courts the right to rule them to the advantage of the public. The power was well where it was.

Mr. GALE said this was urged as simply a practice of courts; but was it a rational rule, or one forced and unnatural? Comparing it with all ordinary argumentative proceedings, he considered it forced and unnatural; it left the individual without his natural rights. Every thing proceeds regularly till it comes to the argument as to the criminality, and then they (the parties) change sides. Why do they change sides? The prosecuting officer makes the affirmative argument, the other rebuts it. They are then even; but it is the business of the prosecution to prove, and that is not terminated till he closes.

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. WITHERELL] admits that if the prisoner has the privilege of closing, he will go unwhipped of justice. But will he have more than his natural right, if he has the winding up? The gentleman says the counsel should give a cool, dispassionate statement of facts; but who ever heard of such a statement? He usually labors as if his own life or death depended upon it, and exerts his ingenuity on the facts, so as to affect the minds of the jury. It is proper that if there be any superiority on one side or the other, it should be left in favor of the prisoner. The opposition to improvement and advancement comes from persons of age, who have formed strong prejudices which cannot be removed. We must go to the young in these matters, who have not acquired these prejudices. It is so in all cases. Go to the grey headed medical man; go and show him some improvement in practice; he will ask, what would you do with the experience of fifty years. He sees no reason for it. You cannot bring him up to the intelligence of the age, of the habits of the present time; he has not kept up with the progress of the times. Is not this the fact? This will apply here, and applies to this very question. As he had said before, he [Mr. G.] would again observe that this is a practice both contrary to the principles of nature and right.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BEARDSLEY, and lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush; Church, Cornell, Crary, Diamond, Gale, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Hathaw, Leach, Lee, Mosher, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, Rix Robinson, Soule, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Wells, Whittemore, Williams—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Backus, Bagg, J. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvorado Brown, Carr, Chapel, Choate, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eastman, Fralick, Gibson, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Tiffany, Wait, Walker, White, Whipple, Witherell, President—47.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, section 10 was amended by striking out in the third line, the words "and cause."

Mr. BARNARD proposed to amend section 16 by inserting after the word "contracts," in the first line, the words "or rendering the remedies thereon less effective."

The question being on the adoption of Mr. BARNARD's amendment,

Mr. BACKUS said—Mr. Chairman, I was not in when this article was under consideration in committee of the whole, nor do I know but it has received such full discussion that anything I can say will throw no additional light on the subject; but my own peculiar views in relation to it are such that I should not discharge my duty to myself or my constituents if I did not express them. Whether, in the shape of the present amendment, the rights of the citizen are sufficiently guarded, I have doubts. I believe some provision of this kind is necessary for the safety and welfare of the community. This section, in the present article of the constitution, if it is intended to be declaratory of the rights of the citizens, and for their protection from the encroachment of government, under color of laws, it should be sufficiently broad and explicit to admit no doubt of its construction.

The three first provisions in this section, against bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligations of a contract, are entirely useless here, in our local constitution. These matters are most amply provided against in the constitution of the United States. The present proposition is intended clearly and unequivocally to carry the restriction further, and prevent not only the passage of such laws as shall interfere with the obligations of contracts, but all retrospective laws that shall in any way impair the remedy. There is a large class of important rights within the existing restrictive terms as to the obligation of contracts. Judicial decisions have varied, it is true, as to what is embraced within the term obligation; the weight of authority is, however, clear and well settled, that it does not extend to restrain an interference by the Legislature with what is avowedly the remedy. To render the matter clear and free from doubt, and prevent all future possibility of judicial equivocation, it is proposed in express terms to extend the restraint to the remedy as well as the obligation of a contract. I submit to the consideration of gentlemen on this floor the propriety of restraining the Legislature from impairing the obligation of a contract, while at the same time you allow the remedy to be entirely defeated. It is making a promise to the ear while you break it to the heart; it involves all the injustice and moral obliquity, so to speak, that it would to impair or violate the obligation of a contract. Does the Legislature justly fulfil its high purpose of distributive justice to the citizen in every case, where, by its action, the remedies for enforcing the fulfillment of a contract, existing at the time that contract was made, are diminished or impaired? Had the evil, then, better not be eradicated at once, and clearly, by preventing all retrospective legislation? On the question of retrospective legislation, the courts have uniformly held that a retrospective law, clearly expressed, must be enforced, unless it impaired the obligation of a contract, and came within that prohibition; and that no such law does come within the prohibition, which only effects the remedy. But every court, sound lawyer, philanthropist, and honest man, from old Bede to the present time, have reprobated these laws as manifestly unjust, and unsanctioned by any well settled principles of justice.

The federal and State courts, and especially the courts of New York, have laid down clearly the rule, that the legislative power, unless restrained by constitutional provisions, may pass any law effecting remedies, retrospective in its operation; and the courts must and will enforce it, unless the legislature is restrained by some constitutional inhibition other than that relating to the obligation of contracts. Our own State has in its judicial department followed the same course. This judicial distinction between obligation and remedy, exists with all the force and effect of statute law. It is the rule of property; and in framing a constitutional provision, we should act accordingly.

The leading case of Calder vs. Bull, in the Supreme Court of the United States illustrates this distinction. The court there lay down the rule that they cannot interfere with the decision of the Supreme Court of Connecticut; although the law was manifestly retrospective and unjust, yet it affected only the remedy, and did not interfere with the obligation of a contract. In that case, the courts of the State had acted, passed their appropriate decrees, and the whole matter, as far as the judiciary was concerned, fully concluded, and the rights of the parties put at rest, when the Legislature, by a retrospective law, opened again the whole matter, and again turned the parties back to re-litigate the whole thing over.

It was a marked instance of retrospective law interfering with property settled and vested under a regular course of judicial proceedings; ought we not in the constitution to prevent any such unwarranted proceedings with vested rights, and at once put the matter at rest by preventing the passage of all retrospective laws?

Another case may illustrate the same principle. An execution is levied on real estate; the officer making the levy fails to comply with the law, and the title as a consequence is defective; the owner of the property upon which the execution is levied is unable to support and carry on litigation; the execution creditor, an artful and ingenious man, works himself into the Legislature, or influences others, obtains a special law, purporting to cure the defects of the levy, and drives the poor man from his house and home.

Do the people of Michigan want such laws, such legislation; or had they not rather their rights should rest on a firmer basis, and be in no manner subject to such unwarrantable interference? I believe, sir, they do desire, and if they fully understood it, would loudly demand that their rights arising under legal proceedings, or otherwise, should not be interfered with by retrospective legislation.

The same destructive principle of retrospective legislation is illustrated by a case in our own State—that of Gilbert and Drew—where the plaintiff had recovered a verdict under the law imposing a penalty for usurious exactions; the verdict was essentially just, but technical irregularities had intervened, that induced the judge trying the cause, to grant a new trial, and under the circumstances, rightfully so. Intervening the grant of the new trial and such trial, a session of the legislature occurred, at which, by the suasion of champagne parties and the usual appliances to such bodies, (according to the observation of many of us,) the repeal of the law was brought about with the express view to defeat this verdict, by the retrospective operation of the repealing law. It was done, and the usurer bore off his booty in triumph, in defeat of the law, as well as the just rights of the plaintiff. Many other cases illustrating the principle, and unjust and oppressive operation of retrospective laws might be cited, but it is unnecessary; as all must appreciate the force of this species of legislation.

Shall we then leave the people subject to this species of legislative chicanery, to be stripped of their rights under color of law? On the contrary, should we not, as honest men, mark it with reprobation, and put a final end to all such legislative quibbling, and impress upon future Legislatures the principles of that high character of moral honesty and regard for distributive justice which shall hold the impairing of remedies as obnoxious as the impairing of the obligations of a contract?

Even, sir, in England, under the sway of her omnipotent Parliament, her best judges have given their weight of character and authority to reprobate this iniquitous species of legislation; and some have dared to pronounce it void, as opposed to natural reason and justice.

Why not, then, by a single sentence in your organic law, say that “the legislature shall pass no retrospective law,” and at once and forever put an end to this species of legislation, that exposes the citizen to so much wrong?

The oft repeated attempts to heal up omissions and defects in the proceeding of taxation, by retrospective law, and also in matters of execution and administration titles, are familiar to the observation and experience of every one. The attempt, it is true, when properly secured and met by an honest judiciary, will fail of the end; yet it shows that individuals, and, more especially, communities and sovereign States ought to avoid even the appearance of an attempt to secure public aggrandizement or private gain at the expense of the integrity of the law.

In the same general category is that class of laws usually called “exemption laws.” Much, sir, has been said on this floor in praise of our exemption and stay laws in particular, and maintaining such a system in general. A darker day never dawned on a country and its mercantile and civil prosperity, than the birth day of such a system. They, in fact, make the poor man poorer and the rich man richer.

Such has been the practical result in this State, besides deplorably crushing the commercial morals of the country.

You may exempt the whole broad acres of the State, and you will but change the mode of subjecting them to commercial availability, and cover with mortgages that which before was subject to execution.

In every view, this entire course of legislation is objectionable, both in a moral and commercial point of view. The remedy is now within the reach of the people of this State. Let us wipe out and obliterate this stain and reproach upon us as a people by putting it beyond the power of our Legislature to retrospectively effect either rights or remedies.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Bill of Rights being under consideration,

Mr. BARNARD modified his amendment, offered in the morning, and the question being upon its adoption,

Mr. J. D. PIERCE rose to a question of order. He objected to the reception of the amendment on the ground that the subject matter had been previously disposed of by the Convention.

The CHAIR said the Bill of Rights was the subject under consideration, and which might be amended before ordering to a third reading. He did not think this distinct matter had been finally disposed of; he therefore ruled the amendment in order.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE would state, in reply to the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. BACKUS,) that he thought the people of the State, and especially the poorer classes, would be surprised at the discovery the gentleman had made, that our exemption laws had been an injury to them.

He (Mr. P.) did not believe the Convention was prepared to say that they should not stay the progress of desolation, when it was brought upon them by the Legislature. They may be spoiled, and would have been, but for some remedial acts. Say what he will, there are two sides of the question. It is the duty of the State to do right. As the Convention had expressed by a decided vote their views on this question, he (Mr. P.) would not occupy more time upon it.

The amendment offered by Mr. BARNARD was negatived, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Axford, Backus, Barnard, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Choate, J. Clark, Cornell, Desnoyers, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Leach, Lee, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Raynale, Robertson, Tiffany, Wait, Whipple, Williams, Withere—34.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Church, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Crary, Daniels, Dimond, Gardiner, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, Mosher, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Wells, Whittemore, President—50.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to take from the table his motion of Saturday, to postpone the further consideration of the Bill of Rights until all other articles were disposed of.

The motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the vote by which the Convention refused to strike out section 7, on the 21st inst., and insert a substitute offered by Mr. Hanscom, was reconsidered.

And the substitute proposed as follows, was lost:

"Any person may publish his sentiments on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; and in all prosecutions for libel, the truth, unless published from malicious motives, shall be sufficient defence to the person charged, and the jury shall be judges of the law and the fact."

Mr. SULLIVAN offered the following amendment to section 23:

Insert after the word "implied," in first line, the following: "except in cases of fraud or breach of trust, or of moneys collected by a public officer, or in any professional employment."

Mr. RAYNALE moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "or in any professional employment;" which was lost.

Mr. RAYNALE had no objection to leave lawyers subject to the exception, but he objected to leave physicians in that position, for the fact that the legislature had taken from them all legal means of obtaining pay for their services; and as there seemed to be a disposition in the Convention to leave the legislature power to do so, it would be hard, after taking away all legal remedy to collect debts, that they should be liable to imprisonment for malpractices.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. SULLIVAN'S amendment was adopted.

Mr. CHURCH offered the following:

Resolved, That sections 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30 and 31, be referred to the committee on the arrangement and phraseology of the Constitution, with instructions to insert the same in the appropriate articles, and to adapt them thereto.

Mr. C. said—I presume, sir, the work of perfecting, that has been going on in this Convention for some time, is now about ended. This Bill of Rights has been licked into something like the desired comeliness and proportion. If there be any members desirous of still further prosecuting the endeavor—if any one wishes to amend an existing section or to add another—I will not press the resolution at this time. But I suppose, sir, the rage for amendment has become somewhat satiated, and I will proceed to make a remark or two in support of the resolution.

I have, sir, carefully examined this Bill of Rights; I have analyzed its sections, and I find that a number of them relate to the judiciary, and its course of procedure; a number to the Legislature and the character of the laws by it to be enacted; a number to the militia and the organization and operations thereof; a few to incorporations, their powers and action, and then what remains of the article is of a miscellaneous character, and without any apparent or real usefulness.

The resolution comprises in its enumeration the several classes of which I have spoken. There are still left a few sections, the first ones in the article, which speak of the inalienable rights of man, which I regard as solemn humbugs; such, however, in this position, I am willing to leave for their final passage, confident that the good sense of the Convention will, when they are put upon that passage, reject them. Otherwise, they should be enlarged by the addition of several other plausible truisms, such as “all may breathe the common air,” “all men have the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness,” and all such axioms, and as many more as the ingenuity of members might manufacture, I am willing should be proffered here as a “Bill of Rights,” confident, I again say, that the good sense of this Convention will properly dispose of them.

The committee on phraseology and arrangement, I trust, sir, will adapt the sections mentioned in the resolution to those articles of the new constitution to which they refer—with which they have any connexion. They will thus be preserved, and insure to the people of the State all the benefits they were framed to secure. They will then be in a form commended by good taste—holding in view their meaning, object and influence. Elsewhere, they are a pointless and valueless declaration of doctrines, without necessity and without apology.

I say, sir, I see no necessity for a Bill of Rights, to be prefixed to this constitution. And upon this topic I will read from Judge STORY, who has been so often cited here, and whose remarks will convey to this Convention my ideas in much better language than I can myself employ.

In the 3d volume of his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, pp. 714 and 715, he says: “Bills of Rights are, in their origin, stipulations between kings and their subjects—abridgements of prerogative in favor of privilege and reservations of rights not surrendered to the prince. Such was Magna Charter, obtained by the Barons, sword in hand, of King John. Such were the subsequent confirmations of that charter by succeeding princes. Such was the Petition of Right, assented to by Charles the First, in the beginning of his reign. Such also was the declaration of rights presented by the lords and common, to the Prince of Orange, in 1698, and afterwards put into the form of an act of Parliament, called the Bill of Rights. It is evident, therefore, that according to its primitive signification, a bill of rights has no application to constitutions professedly founded upon the power of the people, and executed by persons who are immediately chosen by them to execute their will. In our country, in strictness the people surrender nothing; and as they retain every thing, they have no need of particular reservations. 'We, the people of the United States, to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America,' is a better recognition of popular rights, than volumes of those aphorisms which make a principal figure in several of our State bills of rights, and which would sound better in a treatise on ethics than in a constitution of government."

Our theory is, Mr. President, that sovereignty resides in the people. Whatever government we institute, has only delegated powers. Those not expressly, or by justifiable inference, delegated to our agents yet remain, and will continue to remain, in us—in the people. In fact, s.r, this enumeration of rights contained in the article we have had so long under consideration, might be construed to disparage or even to deny the possession of others by the people—the fountain, the source, and the bestower of all power. And against such a conclusion have some States, expressly, in direct words, striven to guard.

I submit to the Convention, as a mere matter of taste, whether a constitution, commencing with the simple announcement that "we, the people of the State of Michigan, in Convention assembled, to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity, have ordained and do ordain this constitution of government;"—proceeding then to a division of the powers of government; then to an article establishing, for instance, the legislative department, setting out its construction, its operation, its limits and restrictions; then an article establishing the judiciary, its formation, its jurisdiction, and its extent and manner of action, and thus through; describing with simplicity and clearness, each part of our government, its powers, and closing in each by the necessary checks and balances—would not present to the world a better document, one in better taste, and of more manifest utility, than one lumbered with a bill of rights, confused, miscellaneous, and calculated only to mislead the inquirer, by its unfortunate location of those principles, which should be in that position where their value can be apparent at a single glance. Every declaration of principle in this Bill of Rights, designed to prevent the abuse of delegated power, can be preserved by the committee, to whom I propose the reference, and be appropriately placed in their final draft of the constitution, to be, at the close of this session, laid before us. I hope, sir, the Convention will take my view of this subject, and refer the article.

Mr. McCLELLAND said—After being read a third time, the Bill of Rights will go, as a matter of course, to the committee on phraseology. He concurred with the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] in his view of the subject.

Mr. CHURCH withdrew his resolution.

Mr. RAYNALE offered an amendment to the bill, to stand as section —, "Capital punishment is prohibited."

Mr. McCLELLAND was willing to let the matter rest with the Legislature. They had abolished it, and he was willing they should fully try the experiment; but he was opposed to placing the prohibition in the constitution.

Mr. BACKUS was opposed to the insertion of the article in the Bill of Rights, until the expediency of the measure was tested. In the absence of that conviction, he was disposed to wait for the report of the committee on crimes and misdemeanors, who had this subject under consideration. He [Mr. B.] expected an able report from that committee, notwithstanding the chairman had vacated his seat.

Mr. WILLIAMS would vote against such a provision in the constitution. He would leave it for legislative action.

Mr. WITHERELL would leave it to the people to act through the Legislature. He would not have them impose the death penalty, unless it should become absolutely necessary. If crimes should become rife, as on the Mississippi, it might be necessary again to resort to the death penalty.

Mr. S. CLARK hoped the gentleman would withdraw the measure at this time. He was not prepared to make it the organic law of the land. The Legislature had abolished it; let it remain there. As had been said, if crimes should become numerous, the Legislature would have the power to renew it. Why not let it remain as it is? Why compel the Convention to vote on it at present? Mr. C. said it appeared to him to be acting on a question of great importance without due deliberation.

Mr. RAYNALE withdrew the amendment, on an understanding that he would present it for the consideration of the Convention on some other occasion.

Mr. McLEOD proposed to incorporate in the Bill of Rights, the following: "The universal education of the youth of our country is indispensable to the purity and permanency of our democratic institutions and system of government."

Mr. RAYNALE moved to insert "and whig."

Mr. LEACH would add "free soil."

Mr. McLEOD said—I offer this proposition for two-fold purposes. This Bill of Rights contains five or six very incongruous propositions, affirmative of fixed facts and maxims.

He was desirous that this should be admitted on the same footing as those ancient propositions. He had found it in the report of the chairman of the committee on education. He wanted to see it incorporated, because it originated with ourselves. Almost every proposition was copied from the Wisconsin constitution. While we are vagabondizing, like a beggar with a basket begging cold provisions, he was desirous of seeing something of our own inserted. The proposition was so obvious, so true, that no one could call it in question. As it was so indisputable, he hoped it would be inserted.

Mr. WILLIAMS would suggest that the word "white" might be an improvement, if inserted before the word "democratic."

The motion did not prevail.

The article was read a third time, and,

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, was referred to committee on phraseology, with instructions to insert the same in the appropriate articles and to adapt them thereto.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled State Officers, Mr. J. D. PIERCE in the chair.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the words "Attorney General" were stricken out of the second line of first section.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out the words "an Auditor General."

Which did not prevail.

Mr. WHITEMORE moved to insert in the 1st line, after the words "Secretary of State," the words, "who shall be ex-officio Superintendent of Public Instruction."

Mr. CRARY—As the gentleman who proposes this amendment had been Secretary of State, at a salary of $1,000, he wished to know if there was not business in that office to occupy the time of one man; as there had been an under Secretary, he (Mr. C.) should have supposed so.

Mr. WITHEREEL was of opinion that the Convention should look to the increase of population in the State, and fix the Constitution with some reference to a future state of things.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said—By the system of public instruction proposed by the committee on education, the labors of Superintendent would be vastly increased, if he discharge his duties faithfully. It would be onerous to throw the burden on the Secretary of State.

Mr. BUSH said—They had no provision in the Constitution of the State of New York for the appointment of such an officer. The Secretary of State was ex-officio Superintendent.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH said—that was true; but it was also a fact that the duties of the office were performed by another person.

Mr. BUSH was aware that the duties were performed by the under Secretary of State, but we have the same officer here.

Mr. HANSCOM said—To elect the head of a department and give him power to appoint and superintend others who do the labor, and who receive salaries almost equal to his own, would be wrong.

Mr. WITHERELL would rather combine the Commissioner of the Land Office with the office of Secretary of State.

Looking at the vast importance of the education of the youth of the country, he should prefer that it be placed under the control of a person who should have it solely and exclusively—of a person who should not be under the necessity of leaving the business in the hands of a clerk, but that he should be elected as such. The expense would not be varied much. We shall only be giving the Secretary of State the appointing power, instead of keeping it in our own hands, and carrying it out by election. If there was one subject of vital importance, it was this; and he believed the duties were such as to require the faithful attention of one man. At certain seasons it must be evident the Secretary of State could not perform them.

The question was taken on striking out, and lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the words "who shall be ex-officio," in the second line.

Mr. R. said the object of the amendment was to leave the offices of Treasurer and Commissioner of the Land Office as distinct departments, instead of combining them, as reported by the committee.

The office of State Treasurer was one of the most important offices. The office of Commissioner is also of much importance, requiring a deputy and a clerk. It would be very improper to unite those offices and give the Treasurer the appointing power—the power to appoint a Commissioner and two clerks. Mr. R. Would admit that a difference of opinion existed on this question; but it appeared to him that the office was one of growing importance, and that there should be some person elected by the people, and responsible to them for the duties of that office.

Mr. S. CLARK hoped the report of the committee would be sustained. He was opposed to multiplying unnecessary offices. The other State officers are of opinion that they can do the business of this office in addition to their own. Under such circumstances he thought it improper to keep it up as a distinct State department.

Mr. REDFIELD believed the business of the Land Office was of such a character as might with propriety devolve on the Treasurer. The duties were merely of a mechanical nature. The business of the greatest importance had been done—the five hundred thousand acres of land granted by Congress to this State, had been disposed of. The business of the office is merely keeping an account with those who have bought school lands, and occasionally selling a lot; it can be carried on by subordinates. The committee who reported the article had no doubt in their minds with regard to the propriety of combining the two offices.

Mr. CORNELL had been informed from a reliable source, that the Treasurer can perform the duties of the Land Office, and perform them well. He would have half or two-thirds of his time which he could spare from his duties as Treasurer, to devote to the duties of the Land Office.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he was not much versed in State affairs; but it seemed to him the State officers would like to have the appointing power, instead of its being left with the people. The Legislature last winter passed a bill to combine this office with that of the Auditor, but afterwards repealed it.

Mr. N. PIERCE said—I should be glad to go with the gentleman to dispose of all the offices that can be done prudently. I think it is not best to abolish this office, which ought to be under the management of an officer possessing judgment and financial skill to take care of the funds of education. Without due care of those funds we shall do little to educate our children. In other States there has always been an agent—an acting agent—employed for years, regularly. For my own part, the more I have looked it over, I think it almost as necessary to have that officer as to have a Governor. I think the office of Lieutenant Governor might be done away with; but I do not believe the duties of the Land Office should be amalgamated. It requires a man to look after the lands; to see that no depredations be committed upon them. It will be better to elect an officer than to allow the State Treasurer to do it and appoint a clerk.

Mr. LEACH hoped the amendment would not prevail. He believed the duties of the land office could be performed equally well by the State Treasurer, as he was informed the Treasurer could spare sufficient time from the duties of his office to attend to those of the land office. There are but few periods when the duties of Treasurer are arduous; he has a large amount of time on his hands. The transfer of the duties of the land office to him would effect a considerable saving of expense.

Mr. BUSH said he had been rather inclined to support the proposition of the committee to merge the two offices in one; but he must confess the arguments of the gentleman from Oakland and others had changed his opinion.

By the amendment of the constitution which has been adopted by the people, the appointing power is taken from the Governor. But what are we about to do? To elect a State Treasurer and give him a great patronage. He will hold the purse and almost wield the power of the sword. We shall place in the hands of the Treasurer what ought to be in the hands of the people. If, under the present arrangement, two clerks are not required in the land office, let one be dismissed; but if it be proper that the electing power should be in the hands of the people, let them exercise it.

Mr. CRARY contended that there was an absolute necessity for retaining the office and the superintendence of a Commissioner, who had not only office duties to perform, but had to go into the interior of the State and look after the public lands. If this office should be closed, the trespasses on the public lands would be enormous. Land now worth twenty dollars an acre, would be reduced to the value of twenty shillings. The business would be better done in a separate office; there were duties enough for the Commissioner to perform, and the State Treasurer will have as much money through his hands as he can receive and pay out.

Mr. BAGG was not disposed to blend these two offices together. He would prefer that the Commissioner should be elected by the people than appointed by the Treasurer.

Mr. CHURCH was of opinion that the Convention should not act solely in view of present circumstances, but should look to future contingencies. When (said Mr. C.) we look to the source from which we have derived those lands, who can say that the source of beneficence is closed up? When we see the liberal views put forth lately by Mr. WEBSTER, and other popular men, may we not expect more liberal donations of lands.

We have not yet received our due proportion of lands with the other North-western States. Ohio has received from grants by Congress a million of acres more land than the State of Michigan; and we may put in our claim for an additional donation. We cannot expect it except for the purposes of education. If that be the case, do we not see a necessity for the continuance of this office? If we retain such an officer, and make arrangements so that he shall look after the public lands, as other land owners do, he might find occasion to put in force the laws for the protection of such property.

Mr. S. CLARK considered this office a useless one. The duties would be better performed by the Treasurer, than under the present system. He considered it a question of economy, whether we should pay out a thousand dollars for a commissioner of this office, the duties of which could be better performed by the Treasurer and clerks, and which duties appertain to the office of Treasurer. He (Mr. C.) did not believe the liberties of the people of the State would be endangered by leaving the appointment of a clerk or two in the hands of the Treasurer.

Mr. WALKER—It has been said that because the 500,000 acres of land have been disposed of, the business of the office must be terminated. But a small portion only of the school and university lands are disposed of, and the business will be increasing. The Commissioner has to keep an account open with every individual purchaser of those lands. As the sales increase, the business of the office will increase.

On motion of Mr. HANSKOM, the committee rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, (20th day,) June 25.

The Convention was called to order at the usual hour.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. LOVELL: of D. L. Case and 13 others, praying that there may be submitted to the people for their approval or disapproval, a provision prohibiting the sale, manufacture, and importation of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, from and after the first day of January, 1854, which provision, if approved by the people, shall become a part of the new constitution.

Referred to the select committee appointed on the 17th inst.

By Mr. BEESON: of Chas. Jewett and 106 others, citizens of Berrien county, requesting such action by this Convention as will check the emigration of slaves into this State from others; and also a remonstrance against the submitting of any provision granting the right of suffrage to any other than free white citizens.

Referred to the committee of the whole.

REPORTS.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE, from a majority of the committee on exemptions and the rights of married women, submitted the following:

ARTICLE —.

Exemptions and the Rights of Married Women.

1. The personal property of every resident of this State shall be exempted to the amount of not less than five hundred dollars, from sale on execution or other final process of any court of law or equity.

2. The homestead of every family, of not less than forty acres, which shall not be included in any city, village or recorded town plat, or in lieu thereof, any lot in any city, village or recorded town plat, shall not be subject to forced sale for any debt hereafter incurred; nor shall the owner of such homestead, if a married man, alienate the same by any deed of conveyance, without the consent of his wife, obtained in due form of law.

3. The homestead of any family, after the death of the owner thereof, shall likewise be exempt from the payment of his debts contracted after the adoption of this constitution, in all cases where any minor children shall survive the death of such owner, for their benefit and support during minority.

4. Whenever the owner of any homestead shall de cease, leaving a widow, but no children, the same shall also be exempt, and the rents and profits thereof shall accrue to her benefit during the time she shall remain a widow; provided she be not the owner of a homestead in her own right.

5. The real and personal estate of every female, acquired before marriage, and all property to which she may afterwards become entitled, by any gift, grant, inheritance or devise, shall be and remain the estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations or engagements of her husband.

Mr. P. stated that a minority of the same committee would make a counter report.

The article was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WHITE offered the following:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn at noon, on Monday the 1st day of July next, it stand adjourned until Wednesday morning, July 10th, ensuing.

Mr. HANSCOM moved the previous question, which was seconded, and the yeas and nays being demanded, the resolution was lost; yeas—38; nays—45.

Mr. CHURCH offered the following:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the Land Office be and he is hereby requested to furnish to this Convention with all convenient dispatch, a statement embracing, as far as practicable, the following particulars:

1st. What quantity of Primary School Lands is still unsold.

2d. What quantity of University Lands is still unsold.

3d. What quantity of Salt Spring Lands is still unsold.

4th. What quantity of State Building Lands is still unsold.

5th. What quantity of Asylum Lands is still unsold.

6th. What quantity of Assett Lands is still unsold.

7th. What quantity of Normal School Lands is still unsold.

8th. What quantity of Internal Improvement Lands is still unsold.

9th. What number of accounts have been opened in the Land Office, upon sales of these several classes of lands, and what number thereof, for each year.

10th. What number of forfeitures have occurred on sales of Primary School Lands and University Lands during the current year, and the amount of penalties on said forfeitures.

Mr. C. said—Upon so important a proposition as that made by the committee on State Officers, now under consideration, I will admit, Mr. Chairman, that I wish for more information than has so far been furnished to us. Were I obliged to remain in the same ignorance of the subject it which, sir, I admit myself now to be involved, I should almost feel compelled to adopt the recommendation of the committee, and vote for the virtual abolition of the office of Commissioner. The enlightened views and large public experience of the delegate from Cass, who stands at the head of that committee, would have a controlling influence with me. But when I reflect that this matter reaches farther than is at first apparent to observation—that it involves in some of its possible consequences the most vital interest of our young State—its public education—that the office now proposed to be abolished has certain connections with that vast and rapidly accumulating fund with which our most sanguine hopes are involved, I must be allowed to hesitate. In this view, sir, I have concluded to institute the inquiry contained in the resolution I have sent to the chair.

It is true, sir, that the only call for information from the departments of State which we have so far made, has not been a successful one. We invoked “spirits from the vasty deeps” of the Auditor General’s office; but like those called by Glendower, they would not come. I hope we may prove fortunate in our second attempt in another quarter.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BACKUS offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on finance and taxation be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the constitution that all assessments and taxes shall be equal.

It was adopted.

Mr. WHIPPLE moved that the Convention go into committee of the whole on the article entitled State Officers.

Which was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the special order of the day, being the report of the committee on the judiciary, was postponed until Monday, the 8th of July next.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the article entitled Militia, Mr. J. CLARK in the chair.

Sec. 1. The militia of this State shall be composed of all able bodied white male citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, except such as are or may hereafter be exempt by the laws of the United States or of this State.

Mr. COMSTOCK moved to amend section 1, by adding thereto the following:

“But all such inhabitants of this State, of any religious denomination whatever, as from scruples of conscience, may be averse to bearing arms, shall be excused therefrom, upon such conditions as shall be prescribed by law.”

Mr. C. offered his amendment in consequence of the fact, that there was in the State a very large number of individuals averse to bearing arms, and sooner than do so, were willing and ready to suffer imprisonment. One particular society with which he was well acquainted, should receive this small boon at the hands of the Convention. This society had always paid freely and willingly their due proportion of all State and county taxes, and were willing still to do so, but from conscientious scruples, they were averse to bearing arms.

Mr. HANSCOM saw no necessity for incorporating the amendment in the constitution, as the section already provided for such cases, if the Legislature thought best to exempt them.

Mr. COMSTOCK—My amendment is embraced in the constitution of New York. I hope it may be adopted.

Mr. WHITE—The amendment is verbatim as in the constitution of the State of New York, and I hope it will be adopted.

The vote was then taken, and the amendment prevailed.

Mr. LEACH moved to amend the section by striking out of line 1, the word “white.” Mr. L. said the section, as it stood, imposed duties on the white population that were not imposed on the black; and exempted the black population from services from which the whites were not excused.

The committee refused to strike out.

Sec. 2. The Legislature shall provide by law for organizing, equipping and disciplining the militia, in such manner as they shall deem expedient, not incompatible with the laws of the United States.

Mr. HIXON moved to amend section 2, by striking out of line 1, the words “and disciplining.”

Mr. HANSCOM—I hope the gentleman will give some reason why the words should be stricken out. They were inserted in the article that we might obtain our quota of arms. The discipline here is by no means strict.

Mr. FRALICK—I hope the motion to strike out will not prevail. It is well understood what disciplining the militia is, in this State. We may have occasion to call out our militia at some future time, and they should be provided with arms. It is not intended by the section to discipline them from year to year, but it is left to the Legislature to make such provision in regard to the matter, as they may think proper.

The motion was lost.

Sec. 3. Officers of the militia shall be elected or appointed in such manner as the Legislature shall from time to time direct, and shall be commissioned in such manner as may be provided by law.

Mr. LEACH moved to amend 1st line, section three, by striking out the words, "or appointed."

Mr. WITHERELL—I hope the amendment will not be adopted. If, in a case of emergency, a rapid organization should be necessary, we might encounter difficulty and delay, unless the power of appointing officers were given. In such cases, an election of officers might not be easily had, and the power of appointment would facilitate the organization.

Mr. HANSCOM stated that the appointment of officers, as provided for by the section, would save the expense of coming out for an election.

Mr. LEACH thought if the militia were ever called out, even in a case of emergency, it would be better for them to elect their own officers. He certainly would prefer to elect his own officer, if he should ever be called out. The principle of appointing officers was anti-democratic and tyrannical—the principle of electing was the true democratic one.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. WITHERELL offered the following, to stand as a new section:

"The Legislature may make such provisions for the support of independent or volunteer companies, as they may deem expedient."

Mr. W. said—In offering this as an independent section, he trusted it would receive the approbation of members. The Legislature might, perhaps, have the power to act in the matter, but the proposed new section placed it beyond doubt, and gave them authority in unequivocal terms. There were many fine companies in the State—in the city of Detroit, and other places, and they should receive the countenance, and to some extent, the aid of the State. These independent companies were organized at great expense to the officers and individual members; and while they were a source of proper State pride, it appeared to him but just that they should be assisted in keeping up their organization and efficient system of training and discipline.

These companies were sometimes called out, as they were ready at any hour to march in the service of the country. One had been stationed at Mackinaw, and another at Dearborn, and it might be necessary to call them out again. There were no internal troubles at present, requiring their services; but experience had shown there might be an actual necessity for them in cases of riot and other disturbances. In Philadelphia and New York, the former particularly, the volunteers were often called out, and quelled these disturbances. Their efficiency and value were plainly shown in these cases.

These companies (said Mr. W.) were composed of respectable and valuable young men. Their organization and equipment, as he had stated, were expensive, and a heavy tax on them individually. A small amount drawn from a wider source would be scarcely felt, while it would relieve them from an onerous individual expense. He did not expect the Legislature to make an appropriation for the aid of these companies, but by setting off fines that may be imposed, it would afford the necessary assistance. He hoped the proposition would be adopted.

Mr. HANSCOM said—The committee, with the exception of one member, were all in favor of such a proposition, if it were not already in the power of the Legislature to make the provisions desired. It was thought best that the article should possess the quality of brevity; hence the omission to state the matter fully. If there were any doubt as to the authority of the Legislature to make the necessary provisions under the section, he would be in favor of adding the proposed section, so that the Legislature would consider it obligatory on them to do it.

Mr. MORRISON saw no necessity for incorporating the provision in the constitution. He did not want a standing army in the State.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend by striking out "support," and inserting "organizing."

Mr. WITHERELL supposed that was already provided for. The amendment, if adopted, would destroy the effect and intention of the proposed section. As it was a matter of doubt whether, by the article reported by the committee, the Legislature had authority to make any provision for the aid and support of independent companies, he had offered the proposition to place it beyond cavil. If the State did not wish to have these independent uniform companies, abolish them at once. If they preferred to have them, let the State aid and assist in keeping them up. Most of these companies were well drilled, and would compare favorably with those of other States.

Mr. MORRISON had no objection to authorize the Legislature to provide for the organization of independent companies, but he did object to authorizing the Legislature to provide for their organization and support—to pay them money. If they are paid, (said Mr. M.) do we not provide for a standing army? And does not the proposition intend that the Legislature shall pay for their training, &c.? Such, undoubtedly, would be the construction placed on the section. If a tax of two shillings were once paid them, it would establish a principle, and there would be no limit to the amount.

Mr. BRITAIN was willing, after these companies had organized, to grant them certain exemptions; but he was unwilling to authorize the Legislature to employ men and pay them for such services. He was opposed to sanctioning any such principle. If the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. WITHERELL] were adopted, it would open the door to a vast system of expense.

Mr. TIFFANY was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne. From the report of the committee, their intention seemed to be to dispense with the training of the militia, entirely, and some military organization would be necessary. These independent companies were the only hope left, and it was no more than justice, and in accordance with a correct principle, to authorize the Legislature to assist in keeping up their organization. The companies were mostly composed of highly respectable, but poor young men, who were unable to incur the necessary expense.

The object of the proposition was to collect and apply to their benefit a small fine, such as the Legislature should think proper to impose. It was but right that others should pay for what was performed for them, and by the performance of which they were excused from any military duties. The time might come when it would be necessary to call out these companies in defence of the State, and they should be as well organized and as efficient as possible.

Mr. WITHERELL remarked that a very small tax would be necessary to enable these companies to sustain themselves. A tax of one cent on each tax-paying citizen, would be sufficient, in addition to the fines imposed by the companies on absentees. But there were other modes by which the Legislature could aid them, and he was willing to leave it to that body. He hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] would not prevail.

Mr. GALE said he was not aware that these independent companies were of any real benefit to the State. They were only in the cities and villages, occasionally travelling on some pleasure excursion; none were to be found in the country. In the last war their services were no more efficient than those of the militia. He was opposed to imposing any tax on the people for their support.

Mr. HANSCOM—The object of the proposition is, to provide for contingencies. Michigan is a border State, where difficulties are more likely to arise than if situated in the interior. These difficulties have occurred, and they may again; and it should be left to the Legislature to provide for such organization of these companies as they may deem proper, should it ever become necessary to call them out speedily and promptly. It was true, as had been remarked by the gentleman from Genesee, [Mr. GALE,] that independent companies were mostly located in cities and villages; yet we should not be so jealous of them as to suppose they would exercise a dangerous power. In large cities, particularly, their services were at all times necessary to suppress mobs, quell riots, and attend at large fires to protect property. The companies were mostly composed of young men from all parts of the State, and the Union, and imbued with too great a love of country, too much patriotism, ever to be unloyal to the State authorities.

Mr. CHAPEL offered the following substitute:

"The Legislature may provide for the organization of independent companies, provided no tax shall be levied, or appropriation from the treasury for such object shall be made, except in times of public danger."

Mr. C. said he thought a provision of this character necessary. He was willing to extend some encouragement to young men to enable them to organize their companies, elect officers, &c. Their services might be needed in cases of emergency, and they should be ready at all times; but he was decidedly unwilling to authorize the Legislature to levy any tax for their support, unless in times of public danger.

Mr. GALE could discover no difference in effect, between the substitute and the original proposition. If the Legislature provided for the organization of these companies, they would be kept up, of course. The gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] had said their services were necessary in cities. If the cities needed them as a watch or police, to quell riots and mobs, and protect property, the cities should pay them as they paid their other municipal officers, sheriffs, constables, night-watch, &c.

The vote was taken on the substitute and it was lost.

The question being upon Mr. BRITAIN's amendment, the same was lost.

The question then recurring upon Mr. WITHERELL's proposition, the same was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the committee rose, reported the article back with an amendment, asked the concurrence of the Convention therein, and to be discharged from the further consideration of said article.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back to the Convention; and the question being on concurring with the amendment made in committee to section 1, (the amendment of Mr. COMSTOCK).

Mr. HANSCOM said he trusted the Convention would not concur, as such a provision was entirely useless and unnecessary. It should be left to the Legislature to make such provisions in regard to the matter as were proper. It was not to be presumed that the Legislature would ask the services of these persons unless some absolute necessity made it necessary.

Mr. COMSTOCK, in reply to the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] would state, that he had known persons to suffer imprisonment, so great and invincible was their determination, purely from conscientious scruples, not to bear arms. As he had before stated, if the request to be exempted from military duties was not accompanied by an avowal of willingness to contribute cheerfully in any other manner to the support of the government, he would not ask this favor of the Convention.

The question was taken, and the amendment concurred in by the Convention.

Mr. WITHERELL proposed the following, as an additional section:

"The Legislature may provide by law for the organization and support of independent or volunteer companies, as they may deem expedient."

Mr. W. said some of his constituents felt a deep interest in the matter, and to show them that he had done his duty, he called for the ayes and noes.

The call was sustained, and the amendment lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Backus, Bagg, J. Bartow, Comstock, Crouse, Desnoyer, Gibson, Graham, Harvey, McLeod, Moore, Witherell, President—13.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, S. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Dimond, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley Kinne, Leach, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturges, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams—69.

The article entitled "Militia" was then ordered engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled "Executive Department," Mr. WALKER in the chair.

Sec. 1. The Executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall hold his office for two years; a Lieutenant Governor shall be chosen at the same time and for the same term.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend by inserting after "Lieutenant Governor," the words "Speaker of the House of Representatives, each of whom."

Mr. B. said if the amendment were adopted, similar amendments would be required to be inserted in several other sections of the article. It was not his intention to make a speech on the subject at that time, but he would briefly state a few of the many reasons that might be adduced in favor of his amendment.

First, it would give that officer ample time and opportunity to qualify himself for his duties.

Second, he would be elected by the people—a sure guaranty that he would be competent.

And another reason was, that in case of the removal or death of the Governor and impeachment of the Lt. Governor, instead of having the executive authority fall into the hands of the President pro tem. of the Senate, it would devolve upon the Speaker of the House of Representatives, an officer chosen by the people.

As a resolution offered by himself, some weeks since, embracing the proposition, had been referred to the committee on State officers, he would be glad to hear what disposition had been made of it.

Mr. REDFIELD said the resolution had been overlooked by the committee; however, he thought favorably of the proposition.

Mr. WHIPPLE regarded the proposed amendment as a very singular proposition.

It proposed to make a legislative officer an Executive officer. We divide the powers of the government, and now propose to violate that salutary provision.

Mr. BRITAIN—It makes the Speaker occupy a position the same as that of the Lieutenant Governor.

Another reason, he had not stated when up before, in favor of his proposition, was, that by electing that officer, no county would be robbed of its representative.

Mr. COOK was opposed to creating another office, thus making an additional expense to the State. As to robbing any county of its representative, it was a well known fact that the county from which the Speaker comes, is the best represented on the floor of the House. By creating this new officer, the expense of his per diem and mileage would have to be incurred.

The vote was taken and the amendment lost.

Sec. 2. No person shall be eligible to the office of Governor, or Lieutenant Governor, who shall not have been five years a citizen of the United States, and a resident of this State two years next preceding his election; nor shall any person be eligible to the office of Governor who shall not have attained the age of thirty years.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend by striking out all after the word "election."

Mr. CHAPEL said he would like to hear some reason from the gentleman, why the clause should be stricken out.

Mr. HANSCOM would rather hear some reason why it should not.

Mr. CHAPEL thought it strange that there should be opposition to this provision. It was a guard against young men of peculiar greenness. He was of opinion that the words proposed to be stricken out should be retained.

The motion to strike out was lost.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend by inserting after "Lieutenant Governor," the words "or Speaker of the House of Representatives."

Mr. B. said he hoped the Convention would reflect upon the propriety of the measure. If it had no other merit, it possessed the advantage of securing at all times to the people an officer of their own choice.

As to the question of expense, the pay of Speaker would be three dollars per day; and as the Legislature, after the next session, would be limited to forty days, it would be one hundred and twenty dollars. Admit that it would amount to two hundred, would it not in fact be a saving of expense? He might safely say—and gentlemen familiar with the matter would bear him out in the assertion—that the education of a new hand for Speaker cost the State annually ten thousand dollars. To be sure, there were occasionally exceptions; but it was more frequently as he had stated—the exceptions were rare.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I have great respect for the opinions of my colleague, [Mr. BRITAIN,] and if he will make his proposition when the article “Legislative Department” is under consideration, I will not say it shall not receive my support; but I object to it here. I do not know but a question of order may be raised. The proposition has just been rejected by the committee, and it is not proper to open it again here, in my opinion. My principal objection is this—it is very important to keep the several departments of government separate and distinct, and the amendment proposes to clothe a legislative officer with executive power.

There is no force in the assertion of the gentleman that it costs ten thousand dollars to educate a Speaker. It may be true that there are persons sent to the Legislature whose education, to make them competent Speakers, would cost more than that sum; but there were always persons there competent and well qualified for the office. The assertion is an exaggeration. I, sir, once had the honor to preside over the House of Representatives as Speaker, and I am sure it did not cost that amount for my education.

Mr. BUSH was perfectly willing to listen to a discussion of any question or proposition when it could be elucidated, but he thought any more debate on this proposition unnecessary, as it had been already discussed.

Mr. BRITAIN—The proposition is a new one, and has been very little discussed. It is new in the United States, and only forced itself on me by a close observation of the evils growing out of the present system of electing a Speaker. It is the only plan I could devise for a remedy of those abuses.

I am happy, sir, to find that the honorable Chief Justice is willing to give the proposition, if offered in another article, an impartial consideration. I think, though, he is mistaken in supposing the Legislative Department to be its proper place. I have examined the article closely and find no place where it can be properly inserted. I think this the proper place for it. It proposes to make the Speaker a member of the executive department, and not of the legislative. It is contemplated to give him no vote on any question, and the privilege of speaking only in committee of the whole.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LOVELL moved to amend the section by striking out, “have been five years,” and inserting the word “be.”

Mr. L. said he did not know the opinion of the committee on the matter. The proposition embraced his own views only. He thought a citizen should be eligible to the office of Governor, when he possessed the necessary qualifications, without requiring him to have been five years a citizen. It could not be supposed that the delegates to a State Convention would nominate for the office an incompetent person. Suppose an individual had been a citizen four years, or four years and nine months, and circumstances rendered him the most proper person for the office, there could be no valid reason why he should be excluded from holding it.

Mr. N. PIERCE said the section allowed the election of any native citizen of the United States. The committee supposed it to be proper and advisable to insert the provision requiring five years citizenship to prevent any difficulty that might arise hereafter. In his opinion there should be a limit, but if the Convention thought otherwise—well. It seemed to him a limitation was proper. A person might be nominated and elected, who was not qualified for the office.

Mr. BUSH was opposed to the amendment, and regarded the provision as reported by the committee, a salutary one; he had no doubt experience would prove it to be so. It might be a good argument, that an incompetent and inexperienced person would never be put in nomination for the office of Governor—that such a thing would never be done. But when he looked at the immense tide of emigration pouring into the country, the numbers coming into our own State, he thought the provision necessary. In some of the counties, this foreign population nearly hold the balance of power between the two great political parties; and the day might not be far distant when it would be entirely in their power to control the elections in those counties, and even in the State. This state of things might not occur; and he was perfectly willing that any competent naturalized citizen should hold office; but he would ask if any foreigner could prepare himself to perform the duties of Governor in less than ten years? He must be familiar with our institutions—entirely different to those to which he has been accustomed—familiar with our wants and the dispositions of the people; and although a foreigner may be as wise as any of our citizens, yet he is not so far superior as to learn our habits, wants and institutions, in less than five years.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. BAGG moved to amend by adding at the end of the section, "or over seventy years."

Mr. B. said as the committee thought proper to circumscribe on one hand, he would do so on the other. He considered a precocious young man just as good as one in his dotage.

Mr. HASCALL—I would suggest to the gentleman that the clause does not require us to have a Governor over seventy years of age.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I move to strike out "seventy" and insert "one hundred and fifty."

Mr. BAGG—The gentleman had better wait until it is struck in, before he moves to strike out.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BAGG and lost.

Sec. 3. The Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be elected at the times and places of choosing members of the Legislature; the persons respectively having the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, shall be elected; but in case two or more shall have an equal and the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, the Legislature shall, by joint vote, choose one of the said persons so having an equal and the highest number of votes.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the section by inserting after "Lieutenant Governor," wherever it occurs, the words "Speaker of the House of Representatives." Carried.

Sec. 4. The Governor shall be Commander-in-Chief of the military and naval forces of this State.

Mr. WITHERELL would like to know where the naval forces were.

Mr. CHURCH—There are two scows on Grand River.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved to amend the section by adding, "and he shall have power to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the State, to suppress insurrection, and repel invasion."

Mr. K. said the provision was in the present constitution, and he considered it a good one.

Mr. ROBERTS—The power is implied under the section.

Mr. WITHERELL—I think it is better to have it expressed. There can be no objection.

The motion prevailed.

Sections 5 and 6 were read and no amendments offered.

Sec. 7. He shall have power to convene the Legislature, or the Senate only, on extraordinary occasions. He shall communicate by message to the Legislature, at every session, the condition of the State, and recommend such matters to them as he shall deem expedient.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out the words "or Senate only."

Mr. C. thought the words unnecessary. Under the constitution they were framing, all officers would be elected by the people, and as the Governor would only fill vacancies, there could be no necessity for calling the Senate together.

The amendment was adopted.

Section 8 was read and no amendment offered.

Sec. 9. The Governor shall have the power to grant reprieves, commutations and pardons after conviction, for all offences except treason and cases of impeachment, upon such conditions, and with such restrictions and limitations as he may think proper, subject to such regulations as may be provided by law, relative to the manner of applying for pardons. Upon conviction for treason, he shall have power to suspend the execution of the sentence until the case shall be reported to the Legislature at its next meeting, when the Legislature shall either pardon, or commute the sentence, direct the execution of the sentence, or grant a further reprieve. He shall communicate to the Legislature at each session, each case of reprieve, commutation, or pardon granted; stating the name of the convict, the crime of which he was convicted, the sentence and its date, and the date of the reprieve, commutation or pardon.

Mr. BUSH moved to amend by inserting "a," after the word "upon," so that it would read, "upon a conviction of treason," &c.; which was not agreed to.

Section 10 was not amended.

Sec. 11. If, during a vacancy of the office of Governor, the Lieutenant Governor shall be impeached, displaced, resign, die, or be incapable of performing the duties of his office, or be absent from the State, the President of the Senate shall act as Governor, until the vacancy be filled, or the disability shall cease.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend by striking out the words "President of the Senate," and inserting "Speaker of the House of Representatives."

The motion prevailed.

Sec. 12 was not amended.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN,

A new section was added to stand as section 13, as follows:

"The Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, by virtue of his office, be the presiding officer of the House of Representatives. In the committee of the whole, he may debate all questions; and when there is an equal division, he shall give the casting vote."

Sec. 13. No member of Congress, nor any other person holding office under the United States, or this State, shall execute the office of Governor.

Mr. BACKUS moved to add at the end of section 13, "nor shall the Governor be eligible to any office or appointment from the Legislature, or either branch thereof, for the term for which he may have been elected."

On motion of Mr. MORRISON,

The amendment was amended by inserting after "Governor," the words "Lieutenant Governor and Speaker of the House of Representatives."

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL,

The amendment was further amended by adding "and all votes given for either of them for any such office shall be void."

Mr. STOREY moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

But the committee refused to rise.

The amendment as amended, was then adopted.

Sec. 14. Whenever the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor becomes vacated, the person executing the duties of Governor for the time being, shall give notice thereof; and the electors shall, on the Tuesday next succeeding the first Monday of November next, choose a person to fill such vacancy.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the section by inserting after "Lieutenant Governor," the words "or Speaker of the House of Representatives."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HART moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; but the committee refused to rise.

Sec. 15. The Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate pro tempore, when performing the duties of Governor, shall receive the same compensation as is allowed to the Governor. When in the actual performance of his duties as President of the Senate, the Lieutenant Governor shall receive the same compensation as shall be allowed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The like compensation shall be allowed to the President of the Senate pro tempore when in the actual discharge of the duties of President of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, all after and including the words "when in actual performance," &c., were stricken out.

Sec. 16. The Great Seal of the State shall continue to be kept by the Secretary of State; and all official acts of the Governor, his approval of the laws excepted, shall be thereby authenticated.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to strike out "continue to," and to insert between "the" and "great," the word "present," in 1st line of section 16.

The motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, the words "President of the Senate pro tempore," in 1st line of section 15, were stricken out, and "Speaker of the House of Representatives," inserted.

On motion of Mr. J. CLARK, the committee rose, reported the article back with amendments, asked the concurrence of the Convention therein, and to be discharged from the further consideration of the same:

The committee, through their chairman, reported the same back with sundry amendments, in which they asked the concurrence of the Convention; when,

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Mr. BACKUS, by consent, offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to inquire and report to this Convention the relative quantity of land received from the general government by this State, as compared with the other North-western States, and also to report a memorial to Congress on that subject.

The resolution was adopted.

The article entitled "Executive Department," being under consideration, and the question being on concurring in the amendments made in committee,

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on concurring in the amendment offered by Mr. BRITAIN to section 2, inserting after "Lieutenant Governor," the words "Speaker of the House of Representatives, each of whom;" when

Mr. N. PIERCE said—I hope the Convention will not concur in the amendment made in committee of the whole. I have had some legislative experience, and it appears to me it would be better to leave the matter as it now stands. There are always two or three persons elected to the Legislature, competent to perform the duties of Speaker, and it is the fault of the House if they elect a poor one. It seems to me the principle is wrong. It is fixing an additional annual tax upon the people; a small sum, it is true; but still, it will be fixing one more teat on the Michigan heifer, to suck forever. How the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN,] with his conservative notions, can advocate such a measure, is really astonishing. I say, sir, the principle is wrong. Under it, the Speaker will have nothing to do but draw his pay. He will have nothing to do with the people, and be under little responsibility to them.

The gentleman says that under his proposed system they will get rid of educating a Speaker. I don't see how this can be done, unless they get a body of men, and keep him practicing all the time. How can he know the rules the House will adopt? We know certain citizens will never make good Speakers; and to assume that a State Convention would be a better judge than the House itself, of a proper officer to preside over the House, is wrong. It is no more consistent than that any school district should say who should be the teachers, without any reference to the inspectors.

The propriety of this system is urged on the ground that the President of the Senate is elected by the people. He, sir, is an Executive officer; and they are not in the same position. I was in favor of abolishing that office, but the committee did not agree with me. It is all wrong. It is fixing a tax of two hundred dollars more on the people, to be given to one man—a small sum, but still an increase of the tax.

We have been told, sir, it costs us $10,000 a year to educate the Speaker. If so, we are very unfortunate. But this mode, it seems to me, will make two hundred dollars more. I want to know if there is any need of creating another office? We have talked about abolishing one or two of the State offices, and it seems to me, to create another, would be sinning against the Holy Ghost. It is unnecessary, improper and directly wrong.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—Although I do not concur in all the views of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. N. PIERCE,] I think the proposed system wrong, and am in favor of having the House elect its own Speaker. There are always men in the Legislature fully competent to perform the duties of the office, and I apprehend, sir, they will be better qualified, or fully as well as any who may be selected for them. I consider the House of Representatives the proper body to elect its own presiding officer.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in answer to the arguments of gentlemen. I promise not to detain the Convention long, and I hope I shall not be alone in the defence of this measure.

The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE] says: "there is no more propriety in electing the Speaker by the people than in electing a village or district schoolmaster at large by the people." Sir, if the gentleman's argument means anything, it means too much; for, under his method of reasoning, he might with equal justice and propriety take from the people the election of every officer in the State. And I here beg leave to repeat the statement made to the Convention a few days ago—that "not a single argument can be produced in favor of the election of the President of the Senate by the people, which does not apply with increased force in favor of the election of the Speaker of the House by the people."

The gentleman from Calhoun says the President of the Senate is an executive officer. My proposition makes the Speaker of the House an executive officer, and with quite as much propriety as the President of the Senate is made an executive officer. And now, if the gentleman will permit me to use his argument against him, I will give him a self-evident proposition. If the President of the Senate should be elected because in the absence or disability of the Governor, the President of the Senate becomes Governor, then it certainly follows that the Speaker of the House should be elected and become Governor in the absence or disability of the Governor and President of the Senate, and not permit the destinies of the State to pass into the hands of the President pro tempore of the Senate—a man appointed by the Senate, without the least regard to his fitness for the office of Governor, and a man in no way responsible to the people for the manner in which he discharges the duties of the executive office.

Mr. President, my proposition seems to be surrounded with difficulties on every side. The gentleman from Hillsdale, for whose opinion upon most subjects I entertain so much respect, says he would not elect the President of the Senate; that he would permit the Senate to appoint one of their number, and thus save to the tax payer the salary of this useless officer. And my friend from Jackson says that persons appointed by either or by both houses of the Legislature are responsible to the people, or that they are responsible to the persons appointing them, and that the persons appointing them are responsible to the people for the appointments made, which he says amounts to the same thing.

These are objections to my proposition which I could not have anticipated, but I will endeavor to give to them all the consideration which their merit demands. In the first place, I am free to say that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House should both be elected by the people, or that they should both be appointed by their respective houses, as the responsibilities and duties of the two offices should be precisely similar. Now, Mr. President, can the gentleman from Hillsdale be sincere in his proposition to take from the people the election of their Lieutenant Governor; or is it one of those strokes of policy for which the gentleman is so competent, and which always do more honor to the head than to the heart, having only for its object the defeat of the proposition now before the Convention? If he is sincere, he should give himself no rest until he has taken from the people the election of that officer; and he should carry his scheme of reform still further, and relieve the people from the expense of electing their Governor, also.

I now wish to ask the gentleman from Hillsdale if he is quite sure he would save anything to the tax-payer by taking from the people the election of President of the Senate, and by withholding from them the privilege of electing a Speaker of the House? The pay of regular sessions, is, by this Constitution, limited to forty days at three dollars per day, amounting to one hundred and twenty dollars. Few members will travel more than four hundred miles in going to and returning from the seat of government, which, at ten cents a mile, amounts to forty dollars, making the highest amount likely to be received for per diem and mileage, one hundred and sixty dollars for two years, equal to eighty dollars per year, for each of these officers.

The expenses of the last session of the Legislature were about five hundred and eighty dollars per day; the expense of future sessions may be even more than that, because each house will be more numerous than those of the last Legislature, so that the gentleman can see that one-third of a day expended by each house in electing its presiding officer would cost the tax-payer more than the entire salary for two years, from which the gentleman proposes to relieve them.

Now, Mr. President, the gentleman having, as already shown, saved nothing to the tax-payer in expense, I wish to inquire of him with what kind of presiding officers he would leave the two houses. Would he leave them with officers selected by a State Convention, and elected by the people with special reference to their qualifications for presiding officers? Would he leave them with officers responsible only to the people, and therefore at liberty to appoint the various committees of their respective houses in accordance with the requirements of public interests? Officers, who, having had two or three months after their nomination to qualify themselves for the duties of their respective stations, would be able to organize their respective houses with promptitude, and prosecute the business of the session with economy and dispatch? No, sir, but very far from it indeed.

Sir, he would leave them with officers made; yes sir, made is the word—he would leave them with officers made by a few designing men, who congregate about the Capitol a few days before the commencement of the session, for the express purpose of combining strength enough to control the various appointments to be made by the two houses—officers who, in order to secure their appointments, found it necessary to sell out all the important committees, pledge their friends for the clerkships, the sergeant-at-arms, the door-keepers, and frequently pledge themselves even for the messengers, and who must be mindful of the power that made them, even to the end of the session—officers who have been selected for their availability alone, and without the least regard to their fitness for their respective stations, and who, having had no previous opportunity of qualifying themselves, must be, in most cases, incapable of prosecuting the business of the session with promptitude and dispatch, and remain more or less so through a considerable portion of a forty days' session.

Thus it will be seen that the gentleman would not only leave the tax payer liable to the expense of counteracting the influence of interested committees, and to the dangers of bad legislation from the same cause, but he would leave him liable for the expense incurred by delays consequent upon the inexperience of the presiding officer, which will never be less than from five to ten thousand dollars.

Will gentlemen say that Speakers are not made in the way I have described, and that the consequences stated by me are imaginary? Sir, I have never known a Speaker made in any other way, and the consequences are as sure to follow as effect is to follow its cause; and there are persons in this body who are opposed to the election of a Speaker, who know absolutely that the statements I have made are not only probable, but true. Why, sir, it is the common method of making a Speaker, and all the scheming ones know it, and that is the reason why they are opposed to the proposition.

Some gentleman says the Legislature can sit but forty days, and therefore it can make no difference. Why, sir, does not the State want anything done during the forty days session? If not, why convene the Legislature at all? If she does, then is she not deeply interested in having the business of legislation properly and promptly done?

And now, sir, one word in answer to the honorable gentleman from Jackson, who claims "that persons appointed by either House, and the members of the Houses making the appointments, are responsible to the people."

I would ask the gentleman in what way they are responsible to the people? Did the people elect them? No sir. Can the people dismiss them? No sir. Can the people of the State prevent their re-election, provided their immediate constituents are disposed to re-elect them? No sir. Then I would like to be informed what their responsibility to the people is good for. Let us illustrate for a moment. The last Legislature consisted of eighty-eight members. Let us suppose that Legislature to have had ten officers to appoint, and half a million to appropriate. Had six-elevenths of that Legislature combined and given to the two southern tiers of counties the ten officers and the half million, and had given to the five-elevenths of the State nothing, would the electors of the counties receiving the benefits of this unjust legislation censure their representatives for bringing it to them, and refuse to re-elect them on that account? Sir, the gentleman himself does not believe it. And what if the abused portions of the State were to remonstrate against the re-election of the persons robbing them, do you think the favored electors would heed them? Sir, no one is so wanting in sagacity as to believe it; and there is nothing now to prevent such a combination and such an abuse of the legislative prerogative, except the much slandered veto of the Executive, who is elected by, and consequently responsible to, the whole people. If the gentleman is not now satisfied that neither a Speaker elected by the House, nor that portion of the House electing him are responsible to the people, and that members of the Legislature are only responsible to their own constituency, it is useless for me to reason with him upon that subject; for no matter how recreant he may be to the interests of the balance of the State, none but his own constituents can hold him to an account; and if the State expect faithful and impartial services from the Speaker of the House, they must make him responsible to them by electing him themselves.

Mr. President, I have now disposed of all the objections made to my proposition; but of what consequence is it so long as the principal objection to it has not been mentioned, and of course has not been answered? It is this, sir: the proposition abridges the privileges of delegated power and restores to the people the election of one more of their agents; and who ever heard of a willing surrender of any prerogative by the representatives of the people?—I should have said “by the appointing power.”

Sir, the election of justices of the peace by the people was declared to be exceedingly impolitic. The election of State officers by the people, it was said, would be exceedingly disastrous in its consequences; and the election of judges by the people!—why, the very thought was horrible—it could produce nothing but devastation and ruin. Yes, sir, since your recollection it has been gravely pretended, and some were green enough to believe it, that the people were capable of selecting agents competent to fill all of these offices with discretion and sagacity, and that the people were at the same time wholly incapable of filling these offices themselves!

Well, what has been the result of elections by the people, so far as the experiment has been tried? Why, Mr. President, it has been so entirely satisfactory that the policy has become too popular to be questioned at this time; for in every instance where appointments have been taken from delegated power and given to the people, the result has more than realized the anticipations of the most sanguine friends of the measure; and if my proposition is rejected, the most favorable construction that can be put upon the action of the Convention is, that members kept the power where it is, in order to use it hereafter.

The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE,] says, “if the House choose a bad Speaker, it is their own fault.” Sir, I admit it, but who suffers by it? who pays for the time of the House lost in consequence of an inexperienced Speaker? The gentleman may answer that at his leisure.

The gentleman says that if it would cost $10,000 to educate a Speaker elected by the House, it would cost $10,200 to educate one elected by the people, as the people would be as likely to elect an inexperienced or incompetent man as the House. Sir, this is an unwarrantable assumption of the gentleman, and not sustained by facts. Will the gentleman tell this Convention when the people of Michigan elected either an inexperienced or incompetent man to preside over the deliberations of the Senate. Sir, the people have always elected experienced and efficient men as presiding officers of the Senate, while the House have generally selected theirs without the least regard to his qualifications for the office.

But if the people should do what they have not yet done—select an inexperienced man for Speaker—would he not have two months to qualify himself for the discharge of his duties—even twenty days more than a whole session? If the person elected could not, in two months, make himself sufficiently acquainted with parliamentary law to become a good presiding officer, with a few days practice, what would the gentleman expect from him, if placed in the Speaker's chair one minute after his election, without any knowledge of parliamentary law at all.

But, Mr. President, I have already continued the argument longer than I intended. I will notice one more remark, and yield the floor. It has been said that I propose this amendment, because I have never been elected Speaker. Sir, this gave me pain. I never have asked for the office of Speaker. Had I sought for it in the way in which others have obtained it, perhaps I might have obtained it. It is true, that my name has once or twice been mentioned for the office of Speaker; but I challenge any man to say that I ever asked his vote or his influence in my behalf; and I here protest against this unjust method of creating prejudices against a measure which cannot be successfully met upon its merits.

Mr. President, I submitted this proposition to the Convention in good faith, for the following purposes:

1st. To make the Speaker of the House responsible to the people, by giving his election to them;

2d. To insure the dispatch of business, by securing to the House an experienced and efficient presiding officer;

3d. To relieve the House from the dictation of designing men, and secure the appointment of such committees as the public interest demands;

4th. To provide an officer chosen by the people, to execute the duties of Governor during the absence or disability of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. J. CLARK—I am certain the charge, if made against the gentleman, [Mr. BRITAIN,] is wrong. I am confident he has never thought of such a thing as offering himself for Speaker. He has never offered himself to a lady, even.

The ayes and nays were demanded, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Axford, Bagg, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Burns, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Conner, Eastman, Gardiner, Green, Hart, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Leach, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, Skinner, Storey, Sturgis, Town, White, Williams, Witherell—38.

NAYS—Mr. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Backus, Barnard, J. Bartow, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, S. Clark, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Harvey, Lovell, McClelland, Moore, N. Pierce, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Webster, Wells, Whipple, Whittemore, President—50.

So the Convention refused to concur in the amendment.

The amendment to section 3, inserting after the words "Lieutenant Governor," wherever they occur, "Speaker of the House of Representatives," was also non-concurred in.

The amendment to section 4, adding at the end thereof, "and he shall have power to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the State, to suppress insurrection and repel invasion," was concurred in.

The amendment to section 7, striking out the words, "or Senate only," was also concurred in.

The amendment to section 11, striking out "President of the Senate," and inserting "Speaker of the House of Representatives," was non-concurred in; and the Convention also refused to concur in the amendment adding a new section, to stand as section 13.

The amendment to section 13, offered by Mr. BACKUS, as amended, on motion of Mr. MORRISON and of Mr. WITHERELL, being under consideration, the words "Speaker of the House of Representatives" were stricken out.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "Lieutenant Governor."

Mr. H. said the Lieutenant Governor received the enormous salary of SIXTY dollars. The provisions of the amendment would completely disfranchise that officer, and it might be difficult to get a competent person to fill the office.

The motion was negatived.

The amendment as amended was then concurred in by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Leach, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sullivan, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Witherell, President—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Chapel, Cook, Danforth, Hanscom, McLeod, Raynale, Roberts, Storey, Tiffany, Wait—10.

The amendment to section 14 was non-concurred in.

In the amendment to section 15, striking out "President of the Senate pro tempore," and inserting "Speaker of the House of Representatives," the Convention refused to concur, and the amendment to the same section, striking out all after and including the words "when in the actual," &c., was concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to further amend section 7, by striking out "to the Legislature at every session," and inserting "at such times as he may deem necessary and proper to the existing Legislature, and at the close of his official term of service, to the next Legislature."

Mr. W. said he made the motion because he thought the Governor, whose term of service was expiring, was the proper person to communicate a message to the Legislature, as he must be more familiar with the condition and wants of the State than a new incumbent.

Mr. WITHERELL—I am very glad to see the gentleman coming to the old track. Gov. Mason thought this the proper course, and sent in a message to the Legislature;

but there was a whig majority, and they refused to receive it.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I thought then as I think now, that the retiring Governor should make an expose of the condition of the State. If I had censured Gov. Mason at the time referred to, it would have been because of the want of taste exhibited on the occasion.

The amendment was carried.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike from the second section the last clause, as follows: "nor shall any person be eligible to the office of Governor who shall not have attained the age of thirty years."

Mr. McC. said he would merely state that the question was fully discussed in the Convention of 1835, and it was then decided to strike out a similar provision from the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed, and leave it to the people to share the responsibility of selecting any one they thought proper.

As the name of Gov. Mason had been censoriously mentioned in the Convention, and in connection with the five million loan, he would say in reference to him, that he [Mr. McC.] believed a more honest man never lived. If he had any fault it was the fault that was common to every one who was anxious to carry out the gigantic system of internal improvement so popular at that day. He [Mr. McC.] knew that no man could have been more anxious to be rid of all and any connection with the five million loan than was Gov. Mason.

Mr. McLEOD, (in his seat)—What magic is there in thirty? Some persons at that age begin to decline in intellectual capacity.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I believe that Gov. Mason was honest, but if he had had the experience of older men, he would not have gone astray as he did. As we are shutting up the gaps, why not shut up this? I am in favor of the provision proposed to be stricken out, believing it to be salutary. In the heat of party excitement we might nominate a boy.

Mr. HANSCOM—Gov. Mason has been alluded to, but no allusion has been made to the Governor who succeeded him. Gov. Mason performed the duties of the office with as much fidelity as Gov. Woodbridge; and I believe if a faithful contrast of the two administrations was made, the result would be favorable to the former. Gov. Mason was young, but the disastrous evils of that day are to be attributed to the Legislature more than any other source.

Mr. SULLIVAN—I do not think it is necessary we should go back to past administrations to settle this question.

Mr. WHIPPLE—In deciding this point, Mr. President, it may be well enough to recur to the former constitutional provision and the action then had. I will state, sir, that the question was canvassed by the committee, and they thought that ripeness of intellect and correctness of judgment, so necessary to the Executive, were not generally attained below the age of thirty years. Some men attained it at the age of twenty-five, and such was the case of the individual who had been alluded to—Gov. Mason.

There was such a provision in the article reported in the Convention of 1835, and I remember the motion to strike it out was made by a member now on this floor, [Mr. CRARY.] Mr. Mason had many warm friends in the Convention, and some yielded their judgment to personal friendship. Owing to our difficulties with Ohio, the excitement growing therefrom, and various other causes, it was thought best that Mr. Mason should be the next Governor, and the provision was stricken out to meet his case.

I, sir, have no objection to some limit; but it is not probable that any one will ever be nominated who will prove incompetent on account of youthful age.

I believe that a purer and better man never lived than STEVENS THOMSON MASON.

Mr. WITHERELL cared very little whether the limit was put at twenty-five, thirty, or thirty-five years, but thought some experience was necessary. When Michigan was first organized as a State, there was much clashing excitement on various matters, and a little war, brewing with Ohio. Owing to the want of facilities in travelling and want of good roads, the various settled portions of the State were little acquainted with each other. Gov. Mason was little known. He was a young man of noble feelings; generous impulses and excellent virtues—but he erred deeply in conducting the financial affairs of the State. At that time the influence of the Governor in filling all offices by appointment, &c., was very great; but as the power of appointment was taken away, to a great extent, he thought the position of Governor was not so influential as heretofore, and the limitation to thirty years of age was not very important. Talleyrand and the Duke of York had conferred upon them high stations in their infancy, but such as at that time of life they could not discharge. We wanted no such puerile officers.

Mr. CRARY said—As the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. WHIPPLE] had made allusion to a motion made by himself [Mr. C.] in the Convention of 1835, he would state that he did make the motion, and his opinion in regard to the correctness of it remained unchanged.

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. WITHERELL] had alluded to some Duke. He [Mr. C.] would refer to Pitt and Bonaparte. If we could raise such men here let us do it. He knew no rule by which experience, matured judgment and ripeness of intellect should be attained by reaching the age of thirty years. If, at the age of twenty-five, an individual had as much experience and other qualifications as one of thirty years, he saw no reason why he should be excluded from the office.

Mr. MOORE was decidedly in favor of retaining the provision, and surprised to hear gentlemen express themselves in favor of striking it out. He thought there were enough over thirty years of age to fill the office, and always would be.

Mr. CHURCH—The illustrations made by the examples quoted by the delegate from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] are very unfortunate. I regard the administration of Pitt, the younger, as the most disastrous in its effects recorded in the annals of England; and had not the youthful ambition of Napoleon been fired into phrenzy by his splendid military successes, he would not have perished miserably upon the Isle of St. Helena.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Beardsley, Choate, Cook, Crary, Eastman, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Hascall, Leach, Marvin, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, J. D. Pierce, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Webster—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Witherell, President—60.

So the proposed amendment was negatived.

Mr. TIFFANY moved to amend section 8 by striking out the words "a contagious," before "disease;" and the same prevailed.

On motion of Mr. McLEOD, the words "after its adjournment" were stricken out of the 2d line of section 8.

Mr. BARNARD moved to strike out "dangerous," in the same section, and insert "endangered;" which did not prevail.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to amend the same section, by inserting after "Legislature," the words "after their adjournment;" but the motion was lost.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH submitted the following as a substitute for section 8:

"He may direct the Legislature to meet at some other place than the seat of government, if it shall become dangerous from a common enemy or from disease."

Which was not adopted.

Mr. BEESON offered the following as a substitute for section 8:

"He may direct the Legislature to meet at some other place than the seat of government, if that shall become, when the Legislature are not in session, dangerous from a common enemy or disease."

Which was lost.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend sec. 1, by inserting after "Lieutenant Governor," the words, "Speaker of the House of Representatives, each of whom."

Mr. B. said he made the motion barely to remark, and call the attention of the Convention to the fact, that at the last session of the Ohio Legislature, and of Congress, some four or five weeks had been uselessly wasted in attempts to elect their Speaker.

Mr. B. then withdrew his amendment.

The article entitled "Executive Department" was then ordered engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WHITE moved that the article be printed as amended; which motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the article entitled "Education," Mr. S. CLARK in the chair.

Sec. 1. There shall be elected at each general election by the qualified electors of the State, a Superintendent of Public Instruction, who shall hold his office for the term of two years, and shall have the general supervision of public instruction, and whose duties shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend by striking out all to the word "Superintendent" and inserting "The," and also by striking out "who shall hold his office for the term of two years," and by striking out "whose" before the word "duties," and inserting "his." Carried.

Sec. 2. The proceeds from the sale of all lands that have been or hereafter may be granted by the United States to this State, for the support of schools, shall be and remain a perpetual fund, the interest of which, together with the rents of all such lands as remain unsold, shall be inviolably appropriated to the support of primary schools throughout the State, and shall be annually distributed for such purpose, upon such fair and equitable basis as shall be provided by law.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend by striking out the words "upon such fair and equitable basis," and inserting "in such manner." Lost.

Sec. 3. The Legislature shall establish by law, a system of primary schools, by which such schools shall be kept in each and every school district, for at least three months in each year, free and without any charge for tuition to all children between the ages of four and eighteen years, and shall provide that any deficiency that may exist after the distribution of the primary school interest fund, shall be raised in the several townships and cities, by a tax upon the whole taxable property in such townships and cities respectively. And the English language, and no other, shall be taught in such schools.

Mr. WALKER moved to strike out the words "free and." Carried.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the words "by which," before the word "such," and the words "and shall provide that" were stricken out.

On motion of Mr. SKINNER, the committee rose, reported the same back to the Convention, and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

The PRESIDENT announced the committee under resolution in relation to government land, &c., Messrs. BACKUS, CHURCH, LOVELL, BARTOW and GRAHAM.

On motion of Mr. LOVELL, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (21st day,) June 26.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MERRILL.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. STOREY: of Samuel Higby, Leander Chapman and 38 others, citizens of Jackson county, praying that the Judges of the Circuit Courts may be Judges of the Supreme Court.

Referred to the committee of the whole.

By Mr. ARZENO: of H. V. Mann and 40 others, citizens of Monroe county, praying that the right of suffrage be extended to persons of color.

Referred to the committee of the whole.

RESOLUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND,

Resolved, That the committee on the mode of revising and amending the constitution be instructed to report an article designating the time of election for the several officers mentioned in this constitution.

Mr. ALVORD submitted the following:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn on Monday next, July 1st, the same stand adjourned until Saturday, July 6th.

Mr. ROBERTS moved a call of the House, and the call being sustained, the roll was called, and Messrs. BARNARD, AMMON BROWN, BURNS, J. CLARK, O'BRIEN and N. PIERCE were found absent without leave.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. ALVORD moved the previous question, which was sustained.

The question being "shall the main question be now put?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays being ordered, the resolution was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Backus, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kinne, Leach, Lee, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mowry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, M. Robinson, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Witherell, President—52.

NAYS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Beardsley, Britain, Butterfield, Carr, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Fralick, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Lovell, McClelland, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Raynald, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Town, Wait, Walker, Williams, Woodman—38.

Before an announcement of the result,

Mr. CRARY moved that Messrs. J. D. PIERCE and SOULE be excused from voting; but the Convention refused to excuse, and the delegates recorded their votes as above.

Mr. CHAPEL moved a reconsideration of the last vote taken.

The question being upon reconsidering,

Mr. CHAPEL said—Nothing has surprised me more than to see the determination to adjourn. They have not only wished to adjourn, but they have labored to shut out debate and all expression of opinion, and adjourn the people's Convention to an indefinite period. And this is to accommodate whom? A minority of this Convention, who wish to adjourn, and at the same time retain their per diem allowance. The expenses of this Convention are at least $400 per day, making an amount, if we adjourn for two weeks, of nearly $6,000, besides leaving the business that we have been engaged in, in an open and unfinished state. If we adjourn, I will ask members if we shall not lose the labors of the last two weeks? And whether, when we come back, we shall not travel over the whole business again? That will be the legitimate result if we adjourn over for one week, undoubtedly. It is bad policy. It will detain here the farmers and millers in the busiest season of the year. Harvest will overtake us; seed time will follow; and this Convention will have fewer members than at present. Business at that time will compel the absence of members, who can remain now. There is no good reason why we should adjourn; and it is advocated by those who can best afford to sit in this Convention; and I can conceive no other reason for this adjournment, than that the movers wish to extend their sittings, and receive the largest amount of pay. It is our duty to employ every moment that we possibly can, in forming this new constitution, close up our business, and return home. We are told that the funds of the treasury are low; that there is hardly enough money to pay postage; and I am surprised that, with this state of facts, members will get up and debate this question, when our means are so scanty. Do the delegates expect, by going home, to get more light on any question? No sir. Then what is the object? The per diem allowance? If so, do the delegates expect that the people will sustain them?

Why do members go to the delegates from Ingham, and say, your capital is in danger if you don't go for an adjournment?

Mr. DANFORTH—I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. CHAPEL—It is proper, perhaps, to mention the improper influences which have such an unfortunate effect upon this Convention. I am bound to do all that I can to prevent an adjournment. I can say a great deal; that a great expenditure will be incurred; that we shall be denounced by the public press. And I call upon the old men; I call upon the true men, to set this matter right. They should do it because the interests of the State demand it. I hope the vote will be reconsidered.

Mr. ALVORD—The last argument is the most potent—the press is going to be down upon us, as the gentleman fears, unless the vote is reconsidered, and that the mighty press will crush him to the ground. It looks like Buncombe. He has a mighty regard for the people's money. When gentlemen are always talking about the dear people, in my opinion, they think and talk merely for effect.

Then, sir, the officers of the Convention, they probably have no business at home. Well let them stay here; but probably they, as well as others, wish to see their friends. I know that almost the entire delegation from Wayne wish to go home, and I know that the gentlemen who voted against it, want to go home, and if this Convention keeps in session, will go home. We have been here one month, secluded from the world—shut out from its cares and anxieties. We have had important measures before us, and we do not know the feelings of our constituents. We do receive the daily papers from Detroit, although an effort was made to preclude our obtaining them; but by the good sense of the Convention, the resolution was rescinded, and we yet receive them.

The press is silent upon our most important measures. I notice that it is exceedingly non-committal upon the grand jury question. I do not apprehend any overpowering, crushing influence of the press, even if we do adjourn for a week. I hope that this vote will not be reconsidered. I am surprised that the gentleman himself wishes to go home; and I would ask him if he would be so foolish as to refuse his per diem allowance, if he goes home for a few days?

Mr. CRARY—I wish to give my reasons for not wishing to adjourn. I believe this Convention can finish its labors and go home by the middle of July. I think that if we adjourn, we shall be detained until August. We shall be compelled to take some little time to know where we are; then, feeling relieved that we have been home, we shall not be so attentive to business; and so the expense and the time will be nearly double to what it would otherwise be. I find that the first Convention was in session but little over six weeks; and I think we might with industry close our labors in the same time.

Mr. WHITE—I voted for the adjournment, and did so, because I thought that an adjournment of a week would consume less time than the never ceasing talk of adjournment. The gentleman from Calhoun says that the first Convention finished up its business in six weeks. We know, sir, what ruinous expense we have incurred by hasty legislation, and we should at any rate have learned experience enough not to use excessive haste. If we were to do the remainder of our work as we did yesterday, we might finish the constitution in a week, by bringing the articles in committee of the whole, reporting them back to the Convention, and passing them blindly. I venture to say that there is not a gentleman on this floor that can tell what was embraced in the article that was passed yesterday. We can get through the business in that way, but it will not be economy to do so. The mind of this Convention is agitated with this question—important questions are at issue. There may be good reasons for wishing for an adjournment; members may wish to see their constituents before finally voting; while the expense will be as nothing, compared to the evils which may come from hasty legislation. I therefore hope that the vote will not be reconsidered.

Mr. FRALICK—I have uniformly voted against adjournment, and I hope that the vote will be reconsidered. Some members may wish to go home, and the Convention has heretofore uniformly given leave. I have always voted in the affirmative on the question of leave of absence being granted. I may want to go home, but I do not want the business of the Convention to stand still during that time.

I do not think that if we adjourn the people will support us in this matter. I do not think that it is good policy. We have a large majority present, and I think we shall find it so throughout the entire session; and by remaining we shall probably adjourn in time to give gentlemen an opportunity of attending to their crops.

Mr. REDFIELD—I have been and I am still opposed to the adjournment. We are now fully engaged in our work; our minds are well settled; while, if we adjourn, it will produce a disarrangement and delay. If we adjourn for one week, two will be lost, and it will throw the session forward to a period when we ought to be at home. For myself, as a farmer, I can say that all the labor we can bestow is required to secure our crops; and I hope the Convention will reconsider this vote. If gentlemen wish to go home, I have no objections; but I doubt the propriety of a general adjournment.

Mr. WALKER—I wish to understand the position of the question before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The resolution that the Convention stand adjourned from Monday to Saturday was carried, and the question now is upon the reconsideration of the vote by which it was adopted.

Mr. WALKER—I have heard no sufficient reason assigned for such adjournment, and to my mind the argument of my colleague [Mr. CHAPEL] is unanswerable, and I hope the resolution will be reconsidered. If the Convention had been disposed to adjourn at their own expense, in accordance with an amendment to that effect offered the other day by myself, the measure would have been far less objectionable than in its present shape. If the interests of our constituents require an adjournment, then it should be at the public expense; but I must confess that my comprehension is too dull to see how the public weal is to be promoted thereby.

But the resolution is, in its present shape, highly objectionable in other respects. It gives but four days intermission between the day of adjournment and the re-assembling of the Convention—a length of time insufficient to allow the delegates from Macomb and many other counties, to go and return, without allowing them even a moment's time to remain at home. It would, perhaps, give me as great pleasure as any one, to visit my constituents and friends; but when I am to get but a mere glimpse of them, by riding two hundred miles in a burning sun, and over "corduroy" roads, it is asking too much of us. It would be "paying too dear for the whistle." No, sir; if an adjournment must be had, let it be for a reasonable time, to accommodate all; and let it be at the individual expense of the members of this Convention.

Sir, I am opposed to this system of petty larceny—of stealing from the State for our own convenience and our own interest, even a single day of that time for which we are employed and paid to work for the people. We have been sent here to stop the leaks—to diminish the freight—and to put new spars into the ship of State; and not to scuttle and sink the vessel. I have been surprised at the vote of some of our two dollar a day men, who have supported this adjournment. We have been accused of being parsimonious in this matter. Sir, I think that those who would adjourn this Convention for four or any other number of days, at the expense of the State, are themselves most subject to the charge of parsimony, and with wearing pantaloons with pockets too small to admit their own hands, but sufficiently capacious to hold twelve dollars of the money of the State, for which they have performed no service.

By remaining at our post, and using the utmost dispatch which the importance of the business before us will admit of, we shall necessarily have to protract the session to a length greatly beyond that which was anticipated, either by ourselves or our constituents, and into a season of the year when many of the members will necessarily have to be absent to attend to their harvest. We should also bear in mind the fact, that the sickly season is approaching, and that it will, on that account, be hazardous to waste at present any time that can be employed in bringing our duties to as speedy a termination as possible. I believe that a quorum for the transaction of business are willing to remain, and no one will complain if others shall be absent for a few days, if the business of the Convention is not interrupted or suspended. I do hope, therefore, that the resolution will be reconsidered and rejected.

Mr. HANSCOM—We are in a fair way of discussing this question for as long a time as the proposed adjournment. I therefore call the previous question.

The call for the previous question being sustained, the main question was ordered to be put.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the motion to reconsider was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Bagg, Beardsley, Britain, Ammon Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chapel, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Fralick, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Lovell, McClelland, Mosher, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Williams, Woodman—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Backus, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Carr, Chandler, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyer, Dimond, Eastman, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Kinne, Leach, Lee, Marvin, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mowry, O'Brien, Prevost, Roberts, M. Robinson, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Witherell, President—49.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That no pay shall be allowed to the members of this Convention between Monday, July 1st, and Saturday, July 6th, for which period the Convention stands adjourned, except to those members who remain at the capital in attendance upon their duties.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he was a genuine Yankee; and where he was born they had an old saying,—“sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.” Now, we have heard a great deal of declamation about cost and expense. Why, then, when we have had other questions under discussion, gentlemen were so piteously sympathetic that they quivered with emotion from the tops of their heads to the soles of their feet, at the very idea of touching the people’s money. He wished to test their sincerity. The other day, the annual cost of the grand jury, some $3,800, was ample cause for its extinction. He had kept school, as well as other gentlemen who had boasted of the fact, and learned to cypher as far as single rule of three, and would propose a sum to the Convention. We propose to adjourn from Monday to Saturday; and we all know that nothing can be done the Saturday previous, or the Monday following the period embraced. Our daily expenses are at least $400. If, therefore, we take pay for eight days, we shall take $3,200 from the public treasury. The sum he proposed, was this: If an expense of $3,800 is adequate cause for the destruction of the whole grand jury, what does the State gain by paying $3,200 to us for nothing?

Other twaddle had been current here. We had heard a great deal of this and that being hostile to the genius of our republican institutions. Now, he regarded this pushing our arms to the elbows into the public treasury, and dragging out $3,200 for no services, as decidedly hostile to the genius of our republican institutions. For himself, he had got tired of this talk and pretension. He offered the resolution to test the sincerity of gentlemen. He intended to call the ayes and noes. Let members show their faith by their works.

"Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat."

If "buncombe" is to be manufactured, let a part of the cost come out of their own pockets. He was not making "buncombe," and would be glad to have his resolution and remarks obliterated from the journal if possible; but he was determined to have gentlemen show their hands on this question, whatever imputation he might be under.

Mr. GALE—If the gentleman will so far modify his amendment as to include all who have been absent, or who may be absent, I will vote for it. But it does surprise me to see those who have been absent, and those who declare that they mean to be absent, take the course that they do.

By adjourning a few days it gives all an opportunity of going home; and where is the impropriety when many have gone, and more are going? Some, I know, are under the absolute necessity of going home, while the important matters we have under consideration require the action of the whole house. Another thing is granted: there will not be a quorum present during the week of the fourth. It has been urged that we are to adjourn for eight days. If the gentleman so reads the resolution, his understanding of the matter is different from mine.

A MEMBER—You won't at the end of four days have a quorum.

Mr. GALE—I don't so understand it. I am talking about the resolution, not for buncombe. There has been a great deal said for buncombe—the dear people—the people's money. Some have drunk pretty deeply of the people's money; too much so to make any remarks.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I hope the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that at present the Convention will not adjourn. I suppose that more than half the members are farmers, and expect to harvest this summer, and have had an idea that this business would be through before that time. If that is not possible, it would suit many members better to adjourn a week at that period. If I go home I can at present do no business. Some members want to celebrate the birthday of the Union. It seems to me that I can celebrate Independence as well here as at home.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend by adding: "and that no per diem be paid to those who have been or may be absent, except such absence was occasioned by sickness of himself or some member of his family."

Mr. LEACH moved that the resolution and amendment be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BRITAIN—I have hardly contributed my part to this interesting discussion. It has occupied a good share of the time of the House—calling it from its legitimate business—and now the mover has succeeded in getting the previous question called, to prevent, as he says, the waste of the time of the House.

The gentleman from Macomb has given us his views, and, like him, I cannot see that the public interest requires an adjournment. A motion was offered a few days since, that the members, during the time of adjournment, should receive no per diem allowance, which passed almost unanimously; but it was only an amendment to an amendment, and then the amendment as amended was lost. A capital manœuvre, certainly—first to amend the amendment so as to receive no pay, and then to reject the amendment as amended—and thus get it out of the way of a new resolution for adjournment, one by which members can draw pay, because pay is not prohibited; and thus enable the same members who voted against receiving pay, in order to stand right with the people upon the journals, to vote pay into their pockets during adjournment, without having it appear upon the journals at all; as the vote will be for the adjournment only.

The gentleman from Wayne thinks the gentleman from Macomb will not be so foolish as to reject his per diem allowance. I presume the gentleman from Wayne will not.

Mr. ALVORD.—The gentleman may rest assured of that.

Mr. BRITAIN.—I wish to ask the gentleman from Wayne what the people expect at the hands of this Convention? Do they not expect that the evils of extravagant expenditure shall be corrected? If there is any one thing demanded at our hands, it is to be relieved from the burthens of excessive taxation. And how shall this be accomplished? By receiving our per diem when we render no services; or by spending the time of the Convention in the manner we have for the last week, in debating about adjournments; thereby justifying future Legislatures in an extravagant waste of time and in drawing money for services not rendered? I apprehend not. Last winter the Legislature adjourned for three days, that being the longest time authorized by the constitution, and did not get together again for six or eight days; and this cost the State over $3,000. This is not right and should be corrected. But how can we do it if we do not correct our own practices? Can we go home and say we have prohibited future Legislatures from adjourning and drawing pay, when we have been guilty of the same impropriety ourselves? I think not; it is our duty to set such an example that future Legislatures may be guided by it. I shall vote for the amendment, and then for the principal resolution.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved the previous question; and the same being seconded, the main question was ordered to be now put.

The main question being first on the amendment proposed by Mr. WEBSTER, the same was agreed to.

The question now recurring on the adoption of the resolution as amended,

Mr. AXFORD called for the yeas and nays; and the same being ordered, the resolution was lost, by a tie vote, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Beardsley, Britain, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hathaway, Hixon, Lee, Marvin, McClelland, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Raynale, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Town, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Williams, Witherell—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Comstock, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Gale, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Kinne, Leach, Lovell, McLeod, Moore, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Wells, White, Whittemore, Woodman, President—45.

Mr. HASCALL offered the following:

Resolved, That during the adjournment voted this morning, the per diem allowance of members and officers of this Convention be suspended, and no charge be allowed therefor.

Pending which, Mr. HANSCOM moved that the Convention resolve itself into a committee of the whole on the article entitled "Education."

And the yeas and nays being ordered, the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Comstock, Crary, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Fralick, Gale, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Kingsley, Kinne, Leach, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Moore, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Raynale, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, Wells, White, Whittemore, Witherell—54.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Axford, Britain, Ammon Brown, Chapel, Church, S. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Gardiner, Gibson, Green, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Tiffany, Town, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Williams, Woodman, President—38.

So the Convention resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the article entitled "Education," Mr. S. CLARK in the chair.

Sec. 3. The Legislature shall establish by law, a system of primary schools, by which such schools shall be kept in each and every school district, for at least three months in each year, free and without any charge for tuition, to all children between the ages of 4 and 18 years; and shall provide that any deficiency that may exist after the distribution of the primary school interest fund, shall be raised in the several townships and cities by a tax upon the whole taxable property in such townships and cities respectively. And the English language and no other shall be taught in the schools.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike out "that may exist," and insert "in means."

And a division of the question being demanded, the committee agreed to strike out.

Mr. FRALICK—It appears to me that the system proposed does not come up to what we require. I have drawn up a substitute for section 3, which, if in order, I will read, although I do not know that it will meet the views of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS—It is in order.

Mr. FRALICK—I will at present merely read my substitute. I think that the words "a deficiency of means" leaves the matter too indefinite. When will they ascertain that there is a deficiency of means so as to provide for the payments that are due? Not until the first of June. Well, they cannot raise it until next winter—the school master will then have rendered his services one year previous. I think that will be great injustice. Next, I think that the system is wrong. I am in favor of raising a tax upon the scholar; then you will have something that you can get at, and have it in the treasury by the first day of February; then you can pay it in March, when you want to pay the teachers. I do not mean upon the scholar, but upon the property regulated by the number of scholars. Thus, there are 500 scholars in a township, and there are $500 to be raised. Let the town clerk so report. I propose to amend in this form: "to strike out all after the word "shall," in the first line, and insert "provide for a system of primary schools by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each school district at least three months in every year; and any school district neglecting to keep up and support such a school, may be deprived of its equal proportion of the interest of the public fund, and the Legislature may levy a tax on the whole taxable property of the several townships or cities of this State for the support of said schools."

The present system proposes that not more than one dollar per scholar shall be raised in the district; the substitute leaves it optional—if a dollar be too much, make it less; if not enough, make it more. I think that it is a matter of a great deal of importance, and that we should move in it with a great deal of care. I will move this substitute in the proper place.

Mr. MORRISON—I deem the principle inexpedient to be carried out at the present time; and I think that it would be better to extend the time to some future period, when the people could have ascertained that the great reforms for which we have been called together had been carried into effect. What was the principal object of the call of the Convention? It was, sir, that taxation and expenditure should be lessened; and if we engraft a provision whereby taxation will be increased instead of lessened, the people will cry, "your Convention is a humbug—we expected a decrease of our burthens, but you have increased them."

But aside from the principle, I conceive that the article is objectionable in the highest manner; and I contend that if so carried out it will destroy the primary schools of Michigan. Contrary to the report of the chairman of the committee, who tells us that the system in the State of New York is in successful operation, my information leads me to the conclusion that it is entirely contrary. I am told upon good authority that it is destroying the schools; that by putting it in the power of the townships or districts to say whether it shall be obligatory upon them or not, the property holders, the men of wealth, take measures to destroy the schools; and that, since the new system has commenced in New York, there are districts where schools used to be kept that are not so kept now, and will not be. You take the wealthiest townships and a few men of influence can break up the schools. Then the district can neither receive the apportionment from the school fund, nor can you raise any money upon the taxable property. Therefore, the principle is striking at the foundation of the primary schools.

Gentlemen have contended "that no one shall be called upon to pay money against his will, that we have no moral right to pay for a Chaplain from the money of the State." I say that the same principle applies in this case as well as the other. The property holder will use your argument that you have no right to take property for religious teachings or otherwise—he will say you have no more right to take away my property to educate your children, without my consent; and so he will be furnished with a justification in his attempts to destroy the schools.

I wish to place the primary schools upon a high standing, and to make it so that every person will be obliged to support these schools in proportion to the amount of their property. I have drawn up the following substitute which will show my views, and which I shall send up at the proper time:

"The Legislature shall provide by law that in the year 1855, and every year thereafter, a general tax shall be levied in the State for the support of primary schools, not exceeding three mills upon each dollar of the valuation of the taxable property in the State. Such tax to be levied and collected in the same manner as the State tax, (for State purposes,) and appropriated for the use of primary schools throughout the State in the same manner as the primary school interest fund."

There is another view which will make the proposed system work badly. We will suppose that there are two towns adjoining one another; one may contain 300 scholars, the other 1000, and the first may have three times the taxable property that the other has. Consequently, in the two towns there is an inequality of taxation, and from this inequality difficulties will again arise as soon as it is perceived, because it would be regarded as injustice.

Mr. LEACH—I am not satisfied with the report that we have received through the committee, nor do I consider it the best system that could be presented. Several substitutes have been read, which at the proper time will be sent up. I am not better satisfied with the substitute than the original article. I likewise propose to read a substitute. It differs materially from the others, and I ask the careful attention of the committee to its consideration:

"A primary school shall be kept in each school district in this State at least _____ months in each year.

"The right to attend such schools without charge for tuition, is guarantied to all persons between the ages of four and twenty-one years.

"For the support of primary schools, there shall be raised annually, a State tax of not less than _____ cents per scholar, for each scholar returned to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction; and such tax, and also the interest of the primary school fund, shall be annually distributed among the several school districts in this State, in proportion to the number of scholars in each, as shown by their returns to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction; (and any deficiency that may exist in the districts, after the distribution of said moneys, shall be raised by tax on all the taxable property in such districts.)

"No district failing to comply with the requirements of the law shall be entitled to any portion of the State tax or interest of the primary school fund."

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I believe primary schools essential to our institutions—that without free schools our government cannot exist, and that it is cheaper to provide schools than penitentiaries. It will be found upon careful investigation, that those who occupy penitentiaries are uneducated men; men who have not had the opportunity of improving their intellects or morals. I have no doubt that it is important that provision should be made for the purpose of obtaining free schools, and I think that the better way would be by a State tax.

The gentleman [Mr. LEACH] will find it difficult to levy a tax upon the districts—it was attempted and failed; there are difficulties attending it that are insurmountable. If a tax is levied, it should be levied by the same authority that collects other taxes; for, giving the districts the power of taxation will be found difficult in practice. From the position that I occupied, I know that more difficulties were created from this source than any other one thing. I am in favor of free schools; and I hope, before I pass off the stage, that I shall find this State the first in the Union in the cause of education, and that every child will be able to read and write, and to feel that by education he is a man.

Mr. RAYNALE—I am opposed to this section and the amendments; in fact, opposed to all the amendments offered thus far. I think that the Legislature should establish by law a system of common schools, and I think the subject should be left in their hands; as the system is in progress, it should be left for the Legislature to decide upon, and properly amend it from time to time. We might adopt a system that would, in the practical working, be found not to be the best. This matter should be left to be judged upon by the progress of the age.

I am willing to trust the Legislature, for this reason—if they pass a law in relation to primary schools, and it is found not to be good, the power returns to the people; in fact, it is the only way that the people can decide upon the subject. There will probably be no material difference of opinion between the Legislature and the Convention; and I have as much confidence in the Legislature as in the knowledge or judgment of the Convention upon this subject. What we do here cannot be altered, and we may easily take a step detrimental to the interests of the State. Therefore, I hope that the matter will be left so that it can, if need be, be amended by the Legislature.

Mr. BAGG—I perfectly agree with the two gentlemen who have spoken in favor of free schools. I am in favor of free schools—free as the air we breathe; they are based upon the intelligence of the people; therefore, I shall go for the strongest measures to educate the rising generation. Why do we see so many substitutes? It is, sir, because we have a constant tendency to legislate—we go too far into detail; we are constantly tending that way. If this is voted down, I sir, wish to amend the original section in this manner: “The Legislature shall establish by law a system of primary schools; such schools shall be kept in each and every school district, for at least three months in each year, free and without any charge for tuition, to all children between the ages of four and twenty-one years, and shall provide for the same.”

This leaves all detail to the Legislature, and I should hope that there will be a little wisdom left to carry out the plans.

Mr. ALVORD—I shall not detain this Convention long, but it seems to me there is too much hair-splitting—the same yesterday—the same to day. It matters but little about the phraseology, if it reaches the object. Gentlemen have offered various amendments, and proposed various substitutes, and to my mind, they amount to one and the same thing. It strikes me that the section reaches the object, and that is all that is necessary.

If the wish of the Convention is to strike out 3 and insert 4, 6, or 8 months, I shall have no objection. I think that the spirit of the age makes it obligatory upon us to provide that schools shall be kept up a portion of the year. If we have not school money enough, we should have a tax to pay for the free schools. It is right and proper, and what the people expect, that the free school system should be kept up. Four or six months are little enough for a primary school.

I hope that the committee will not trouble the section with amendments, which may ultimately endanger the views and intentions of the committee who reported. These various amendments are calculated to divide and injure the cause of education, and I was surprised to hear the remarks from the gentleman from Calhoun. I thought that he would go for education in its largest extent. It matters not whether there is a property tax, or a head tax embraced, we arrive at the same end—we accomplish the same object.

Mr. HANSCOM—I am in favor of obliging the Legislature to provide for a system of free schools, and leaving to them the details. If we fix a system in the constitution, it may inflict a serious injury—it may not work well. I think that we might arrive at a conclusion that would be satisfactory. If we leave it resolved that the Legislature shall establish free schools at least three months, or blank months, what more do you want? Does not that cover the whole ground? And is it not endangering the cause of education to go beyond that?

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I regret that we have been so very unfortunate in meeting the views and feelings of the committee. I think that this is a subject of vast importance; one that appeals to our highest sympathies and feelings. We live under a republican government—we have no law of primogeniture, no hereditary titles—but the road to wealth and distinction is open to all. What do we propose in the bill reported by the committee? To render education accessible to all the children of the land, and that the government shall be accountable for the education of its youth, and that the money spent in education will be saved by the less demand for penitentiaries, alms houses, and the expenses of holding courts. We believe that we are called upon to establish a system of free schools—free to all—that the youth may be educated and prepared for the responsible situation of citizens of a free republic. I care not how this is attained, if the object is brought out; but I am unwilling to leave it to the Legislature. We are bound to ourselves, to our children, bound to posterity, to see that the Legislature shall provide a system of free schools that shall afford the facilities of education to all.

I am not wedded to any particular system; a system that will carry out the views of my constituents, and embrace the objects proposed, will receive my support. But let us not submit a subject of this importance to any future Legislature; they may, perhaps, understand it better than we do, but it is our duty so to fix it, that this right shall never be delayed or wrested from the people. Multitudes are prevented by poverty and the force of circumstances from paying for a school education; and it is the object of the article to open the schools to all. I am willing to let the Legislature manage the details, but am unwilling that it shall be left optional with them to provide free schools or not, as they may choose.

Mr. HASCALL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report be recommitted to the committee, with six additional members added, to be again presented to the House, with all the additional information that they can procure.

Mr. BUSH—I should be in favor of the motion proposed, but I would suggest whether it would not be as well to take an expression of the opinion of the Convention. The bill provides for levying a tax upon the townships and cities, and there is a large proportion of property, in the shape of non-resident land, that should be taxed. I am in favor of a State tax; but if an expression were taken, the committee would be able to bring in an article that would be satisfactory.

Mr. WALKER—The gentleman [Mr. HASCALL] proposes an addition of six members to the committee. We have had an opinion from six or eight members, and no two agree, while the members of the committee all agree, (leaving phraseology out of the question,) and the addition would not change the result. What new light could the committee have, until we have an expression of the views of the House? We ought to have that expression in order to be able to report back the section in accordance with its wishes. Let there be a test question. The gentleman from Wayne is in favor of a definite sum to be raised per scholar throughout the State. That was in discussion before the committee, but was deemed inexpedient. The difficulty was, that by fixing a definite sum, it must so remain for fifteen years, or the constitution must be amended; by leaving it open, the sum, if necessary, can be increased without such amendment being made.

The resolution was withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. HASCALL, the committee rose, reported back to the Convention, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT announced a communication from the Commissioner of the Land Office; which,

On motion of Mr. COOK, was laid upon the table and ordered printed.

On motion of Mr. ALVORD, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article entitled "Education," Mr. S. CLARK in the chair.

The question being upon Mr. WILLIAMS' motion to insert "in means,"

Mr. CORNELL offered the following substitute for section 3:

"The Legislature shall establish free schools throughout the State, and provide for their support. After applying the primary school fund, and such other funds as shall be set apart for the support of such schools, the balance shall be raised by a tax upon the taxable property of the State."

Mr. WITHERELL moved to strike out "shall" and insert "may."

Which was not adopted.

Mr. CROUSE moved to strike out "of" and insert "in." Lost.

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL, all after "tax" was stricken out, and "State" inserted before "tax."

Mr. LEACH offered the following as a substitute for Mr. CORNELL's substitute:

"A primary school shall be kept in each school district at least — months in each year.

"The right to attend such schools without charge for tuition, is guaranteed to all persons between the ages of four and eighteen years.

"For the support of primary schools, there shall be raised annually, a State tax of not less than — cents per scholar, for each scholar returned to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction; and such tax, and also the interest of the primary school fund, shall be annually distributed among the several school districts in this State, in proportion to the number of scholars in each, as shown by their returns to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction; and any deficiency that may exist in the districts, after the distribution of said moneys, shall be raised by tax on all the taxable property in such districts.

"No district failing to comply with the requirements of the law, shall be entitled to any portion of the State tax or interest of the primary school fund.

"The English language shall be taught in all the primary schools in this State."

Mr. RAYNALE moved to amend the above by striking out "and eighteen," and inserting after "years," the words "and upwards;" also by striking out "between" and inserting "of."

Mr. R. said—I have not sent this up for amusement. When the population is sparse, it is not easy for a person who wishes to improve his mind to go elsewhere than to the district school; and I would like to see this kept open so that it might be free to all—if free at four or ten years, it should be so at twenty years. I see no necessity for making so invidious a distinction.

Mr. PIERCE—I would inquire upon what basis the apportionment would be made—upon the population of the whole State?

Mr. RAYNALE—I want but one thing; that is, that the schools shall be free to all scholars, without reference to age; I don't care upon what basis it is made.

The motion was not sustained.

Mr. LEACH—I am willing that the schools shall be free to all above the age of 18—that they shall be free to every individual who wishes to inform his mind, whether he is four or forty. But there must be some other basis than the entire population of the State to distribute the school fund; and as those between the ages of four and eighteen usually attend school, that would perhaps be the best basis for an apportionment. I do not propose to pass an eulogy upon the primary school system. Every gentleman here is aware of the benefits that are derived from it. I am the graduate of a log school house, and of no other institution. I have had considerable experience in teaching primary schools, and I consider them the most important schools in the country. Nine-tenths of the people never see any other institution of learning, at least as students, and it is for the highest interests of community that we extend the benefits to all—the rich as well as the poor.

I do not suppose that common schools will do away with Colleges; but I do believe that they should fit scholars for the higher seats of learning, without any other preparation. It has been proposed to put off this good time five years; this is decidedly improper, if primary schools are what we believe them to be. If they should be free, now is the time to act; we have no right to put it off for another year. During the last session of the Legislature the question was considerably agitated. A greater tax was proposed to be imposed, and the only objection was, that the Convention would soon assemble, and that it was the duty of the Convention to provide that a provision should be placed in the organic law of the land; and it was passed over on that ground alone.

The vote of the Convention has said that the Legislature shall establish free common schools. This must be effected by a State tax, town tax, county tax, or a district tax. It appears to me that the true system should combine two of these methods. If the common schools are supported entirely by a State tax, aided by the interest of the school fund, it will prevent much contention and strife. But this cannot be done by a State tax to the fullest extent. If we levy a State tax, to defray all the common school expenses of the State of Michigan, in many districts it will pay the charges; in others, where there are but few children, it will not.

But where this may be the case, they might be intelligent and wish to have a good school, and with proper authority might support a good school. It appears to me that the district should have authority to raise a tax upon the district. If we go back to our system, and collect it by a rate bill, there is no freedom, and there may be very poor people in every district, and the charges might come hard upon them.

As a State tax will not in all cases meet the emergency, the law should authorize a district tax to meet any deficiency that may exist. The substitute provides for that emergency.

In 1839, the returns amounted to $189,000. If a State tax were raised of fifty cents per scholar, and that distributed in connection with the interest of the primary school fund, it would make 35 cents per scholar.

A school of 100 will be entitled to $35; but there may be 10 months school, which would require much more than $100, and we have but $35 to defray the charges. How can we make out the balance? By a rate bill as at present? That is not carrying out the principles of free schools.

I see neither injustice nor impropriety in resorting to a district tax; but there is an impropriety in taking town or district taxes wholly for the support of the school.

Suppose we have a township of 400 scholars, and the law authorizes a tax of one dollar per scholar; it must be distributed among the number of schools in the district. We have had such a law, and it has created much ill feeling. We had likewise a law authorizing the amount to be raised in the district, and according to my experience it has worked very injuriously. If we raise the principal part by a State tax, there are many towns whose schools are not yet organized, that I hold should be taxed for the benefit of the whole. If districts are not organized, holders of property will escape, except by a State tax; and by adopting it, when a few feeble settlers begin to organize their schools, they will find support.

I feel deeply upon this subject, and I offer this substitute for the consideration of the Convention. If a better one be proposed, I shall cheerfully support it.

Mr. RAYNALE—I am in favor of common schools, and free schools, but I believe that this Convention cannot proceed any farther, without endangering the system. This Convention is not as well prepared upon this subject as members of the Legislature will be. We have received no instructions, and I do know that in establishing an original law we may do an injury to the cause. There is one insurmountable difficulty—there is a new system of schools. There is the Union school at Pontiac, combining four or five districts, and they are building a union school house, which will cost four or five thousand dollars. And, we propose to prohibit any language except the English. If the union system answers, there is a great difficulty if we fix in the Constitution this prohibition. Therefore, I am willing to leave it to the Legislature; if they fail, public sentiment will set them right, and urge them forward until the system is perfected.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I wish to make an inquiry or two about this subject, as the information we have received I do not deem sufficient to guide this Convention to a just conclusion. I do not desire at this time to impose upon the people of this State a burden which they cannot well bear; but I hope that instead, we shall, as the result of our deliberations, lighten the burdens that they have previously borne. We are yet in our infancy; we have much to accomplish; and I hope that in a short time we shall be able to effect it. I do not mean our physical development alone, but our moral, as a State.

I think that the question as to the number of children who attend school in Michigan, has been answered about 130,000, and the amount of the interest of the school fund I believe to be about $40,000. I am desirous of obtaining information as to the average increase for the last five years, so that we may ascertain the probable increase for the next five years, and thereby estimate the amount of money that we shall receive from that source, and then the average amount of taxes for the primary schools. I should like to know the amount of school lands that have been sold—the average amount of sales; then I should like to know the number of pupils who attend school—the proportion which they bear to the number of those between the ages of four and eighteen, who do not attend, and then I shall be able to form some adequate idea as to the amount of taxes which will be required to support a system of free schools.

I regard this as the most important question that has come before us thus far; and I am not prepared to go so far as to make it obligatory upon the Legislature to establish free schools, except the people wish it. I think that the people are prepared for, and wish this system, if it do not cost too much. It is a matter of great importance that free schools should be established, and we must commence in our infancy, if, as a people, we expect to be strong and vigorous in our youth. I did not rise to make a speech, but merely to throw out a few remarks for the purpose of obtaining the information which I desire to receive.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—There is a document by which the gentleman from Berrien might obtain the information.

Mr. WHIPPLE—There is a document, it seems, by which I can obtain the information. One point I will mention. It would be wrong to enact that every language should be excluded except the English language. In Coldwater, I am told, that instruction is given in the French and Latin tongues. In some of the German colonies, I am informed, there is a disposition to use their native language, in preference to the English. In such cases it should be applied.

68

Mr. CORNELL—I did not intend to say one word; but I merely introduced this as a simple proposition, to know whether the Convention were prepared to go forward in favor of free schools, and to leave it within the reach of the people to correct whatever mistake the Legislature might make. In answer to the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] who said he was not prepared to go so far—

Mr. WHIPPLE—I said I was not prepared without further advice.

Mr. CORNELL—I would merely ask him, have not the schools been kept up? and have they not been paid for? The people have paid for the schools; and can they not do it again? By the former law, some individuals were shut out. We want it now so that all can come in; and it will impose but little additional burden.

Mr. WALKER—By referring to the report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, I find that the per centage was:

	Am't per sch'l'r.	No. of sch'l'rs.
1845,	28,	90,006
1846,	31,	97,658
1847,	30,	108,130
1848,	33,	118,272
1849,	33,	125,218

The system proposed by the gentleman from Genesee is of the same character as that adopted in the State of New York; and which has one of the ingredients of discord which would, as I believe, destroy the schools in this State, if introduced. I have in my possession a letter from the deputy Superintendent of Public Instruction in the State of New York, in which he says that, if any attempt should be made to change our school system, we should avoid raising any portion of the tax in the school districts, as such a provision in that State had operated as an apple of discord, and had proved very disastrous there. For that reason, the committee avoided any recommendation of the kind. I think the substitute of the gentleman from Jackson contains all that is essential to be placed in the fundamental law, except the minimum time that such school shall be kept. It might go a little further, but it should stop at nothing short.

There is another question which his amendment does not cover; and I will test the question in a third sub-division: "That instruction in all the schools shall be conducted in the English language." This I offer as an amendment to his amendment. This avoids the difficulty suggested by the member from Berrien; it does not declare that no other language shall be taught; but it makes the English language the medium of instruction.

Mr. WHIPPLE—How is that possible, while learning another language?

Mr. WALKER—I believe that instruction is very often imparted in a different language to the one that is taught. For instance, if the gentleman has learned the Latin language, the instruction was imparted through the medium of the English tongue. Something to this effect should be done. If this does not effect the purpose I shall be glad to find a better remedy. Large numbers of emigrants are locating in the State; it is the true policy of the State to have them acquire the use of the English language in the shortest period practicable. There is an anxiety on the part of these emigrants to preserve their own language, to the exclusion of the English; this is an evil that should be remedied. If any other method will better effect the object, I shall be glad to have it suggested and adopted.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE would suggest that in all such schools, instruction should be given in the English language.

The motion was lost.

Mr. AXFORD moved to strike out the word "shall," and insert "may."

The motion was lost.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I trust that the amendment will not prevail. The people have decided that they are in favor of free schools.

The CHAIR—The question is upon the substitute of the gentleman from Genesee.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out "eighteen," and insert "twenty-one."

Which was accepted by Mr. LEACH.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I move to strike out all that part that gives the district the right to tax. My reasons are, that I deem it impolitic to give the district the right to tax—to raise the tax for a school, at all, or giving them a right for any purpose except for building school houses, or repairing the same. I have no doubt that the chief difficulty in the State of New York, and our previous difficulty in our schools, have arisen from such a source.

Mr. LEACH—It was only to supply the deficiency of the State tax.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Cannot the Legislature provide for the deficiency?

Mr. LEACH—The Legislature can authorize the raising of money, but it does not make it compulsory.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I believe that I understand the question now; it is upon the substitute of the gentleman from Genesee.

The CHAIR stated that it was upon striking out that part that relates to the right of the district to raise a tax.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—The difficulties in the State of New York have grown out of this source. I think the substitute of the gentleman from Genesee should be adopted, so that we shall be sure of having free schools open to the whole community.

Mr. CORNELL—In the original law, a provision was made which would have rendered the schools essentially free; but the districts got at loggerheads, and would do nothing about it.

Mr. RAYNALE—How can the deficiency be made up if the State tax is not sufficient, without some liberty to make a tax? It cannot be managed without collecting a surplus fund. I am opposed to the system as it stands now. By levying a State tax sufficient, the people might swallow it readily at first; but it would soon be found out, and difficulty would commence. We may gradually creep into a system of free schools; as our funds increase we may extend and enlarge; but I am unwilling to place it at present upon the basis of the gentleman from Jackson, or that of the gentleman from Genesee. However, when the time comes, I shall call up my amendment to strike out the whole matter.

Mr. FRALICK—From all that we have heard, we might suppose that at present we have a system that is oppressive—that the people could not exist without we have a change. What is the present system? We have been perfecting it for the last fifteen years; it may want a little alteration, that is to say, take the power from the districts and place it in the hands of the towns or the counties. The difficulty now is in the districts, and the district officers are not generally so competent. We have a free school—have had for years. Property might be taxed for the support of schools—it is the people's system—a free system. But have the people universally gone to the extent of the law? No, sir, it has not been done. Because they had not the power—because they did not know? No, sir. But because they did not think it the best so to levy the tax. And, if they have sent us here to levy a tax upon the whole population of the State, why have they not done so for the last two years? They have had the power in the districts, yet not one in one hundred have levied a tax as much as they were entitled to do by the law.

The district that I live in levied a tax last year for the first time; we went to the extent of the law—one dollar per scholar. Well, we knew what that meant, and we paid it, but a great many found fault; and if you place a system of that kind in the constitution, a great many votes will be cast against it.

We have a system upon which the people can act every year. Still, it is said that we must have another change—that people want free schools—that we must take our entire system and throw it away, and legislate in this Convention to obtain an object which we had before. I think the present system is as near right as it can be. I have heard from New York, that they have had difficulties there; and I do not believe that we can change the present system much for the better.

I have drawn up an amendment, which I will read, taken from the old constitution, with this change—giving the towns the authority formerly exercised by the districts:

"Sec. 3. The Legislature shall provide by law for a system of primary schools, by which such schools shall be kept up and supported in each school district, at least three months in every year; and any school district neglecting to keep up and support such a school, may be deprived of its proportion of the public funds; and a tax shall be levied on the several townships and cities of the State, upon the whole taxable property in such townships and cities respectively, for the support of such schools, provided such tax shall not exceed the amount of ——— in any one year, for all children between the ages of four and eighteen years, in any township or city, and the amount of such tax in each township or city shall be distributed to the several districts therein keeping a three months' school, in proportion to the number of children between the ages of four and eighteen years returned from said districts respectively."

Mr. N. PIERCE hoped that it would all be stricken out. Why did not the districts authorize the money to be raised as the law permitted? Because it produced difficulties—for the reason that if you allow one man to put his hand in the pocket of another, he will be very likely to put it to the bottom.

I believe that the greatest difficulty in the State of New York has arisen from the authority given to the districts. Those who pay the least wish the greatest amount to be imposed—those who have to pay the most naturally engender hostile feelings; it does not answer the purpose.

I think we might impose a tax upon the taxable property of the State, but that it should be limited to two mills upon the dollar; and the rest, a tax imposed upon the district, or the persons sending to school, or the property of the town or district.

The State of Connecticut has done the best of any State in the Union. There they collect the public money and pay it to the district; the district keeps school a certain length of time, makes a report, then receives the public money. The balance is made up according to law. They educate all classes of the population without controversy. They have the most funds and have great unanimity.

I know of some districts in Washtenaw where they have spent money needlessly. They have paid great sums to the teachers—paid the officers of the district one dollar per day for their services; and I know that this has produced hostile feelings. Persons who send to school should pay something—how much I do not know; but I think that a small tax imposed in that manner would bring the district to a better understanding than if left entirely to the control of external operations. It is, besides, in that manner productive of greater harmony.

Mr. LEACH—My substitute provides for a State tax. If I could have my way it should be so high that the schools would be nearly free. The gentleman from Wayne says that the present school system is nearly as good as free. We have the privilege of drawing for a school of 30 children about $9 from the State, and $30 from the district, which would give three months a male teacher, at $9 per month, and thirteen weeks a female teacher, at 8s per week. We know what $9 and 8s teachers are worth. If we are to have good schools we shall have to employ teachers that will command higher wages. It appears to me that we ought to take action to ensure the public interests of the whole people—not to guard our own pockets; and with due deference to my friend, I believe that there never was a man yet who could find the way into his pocket.

Mr. CRARY—I am in favor of the proposition to strike out, and am in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from Wayne, and will endeavor to give my reasons for so doing.

We have now had a school system for fifteen years. The first law was passed in 1840; the one now in operation was established in 1843, and was constituted nearly the same as it stands now; and I consider that it is as good a system as ever was got up; I know too, that it has been copied in several States. It provides for the education of every person in the State, as far as our ability goes—it winds up its own business, and it leaves no difficulties that were incident to the first system, where there was a tax collected by the district. It gives good satisfaction to the people—it does a great deal of good at the present time—keeps up an interest in the minds of the people for the great cause of education. And, however we may leave this Constitution with regard to free schools, the subject has taken such a hold upon the public mind, that except you absolutely prohibit it, the people will have the best system. We may, however, hedge round the system so much that it may be condemned before it can fairly be tried. It took from 1843 until the last year to perfect the system, and as so much care has been bestowed, and it gives such general satisfaction, we had better simply interweave in this Constitution the substitute of the delegate from Wayne, leaving it to the action of the Legislature to provide for free schools, by what system or mode they think best; either by general taxation, or tax levied on the school districts, towns or counties. It has been said that the system in the State of N. Y., was not involved in difficulty. I received a letter from the deputy Superintendent of Public Instruction: he says that the system is in danger, because they had commenced upon a wrong principle. The difficulty is this: in one district a person owning a certain amount of property will have to pay $30. In the next, probably a person with the same amount of property, will have to pay no more than $5. Men can and do draw comparisons, and the result is a strong feeling of dissatisfaction; so much so, that the language of the deputy Superintendent was, that the system was in danger. His opinion was that the Legislature would submit it to the people.

Mr. CHURCH—The question is submitted.

Mr. CRARY—I think that the best plan would be, to leave the system to be perfected, if it need be, by the Legislature. The committee on education have, however, neglected an important feature: they have made no provision for a forfeiture of the public money, if a district neglects to keep a school a certain length of time. The old constitution said, if the district did not keep up a school for 3 months, they should receive no money. If we are going to have a system of free schools, there should not only be a forfeiture of the public money, but a penalty if any district neglects to comply with the law. I think that a system of free schools will eventually be adopted. I am willing to leave it to be fixed by this Convention, if an interval of four to six years be allowed from the present time. I am willing to leave it to the Legislature, as long as you keep a public officer, whose business it is to attend to the cause of education; but when that officer is struck out, I should think that the cause of education is in danger, but not otherwise. I believe that that officer is requisite to sustain and forward the cause of education; and that it is necessary that each State should employ one; and that he should have the same dignity and respectability that is given to the first officer of the State. If we are to have a system of free schools, we should have an officer to look after the interests of the whole State; attend to the various departments, and the various responsibilities connected with the duties. I should prefer to keep him, even if his salary was stricken down to $100; if you retain the officer, he will keep the cause of education before the people, and it will flourish. All that I think necessary is, to adopt the substitute of the delegate from Wayne, and provide a forfeiture.

Mr. MOORE—I do not believe that if the sense of this Convention was taken, we should find six gentlemen that are not in favor of free schools, and yet the present system can scarcely come under that denomination. In our district we have a man who has twelve or thirteen children. He said he was not able to send them to school. The district said send them and we will make up the difference. Now, sir, I want the present system so modified that every man shall send his children to school, whether he can pay or not, without any provision that seems like a poor law.

I think that we should all be in favor of free schools; there can be no person objecting except those who are wealthy and have no children. I think that we ought to establish the system upon a thorough basis, and I shall be glad to see it immediately adopted.

Mr. TIFFANY—I am in favor of free schools; but I do not see the necessity for our saying in this constitution that there shall be free schools, as I have no doubt that the Legislature will do it when the people demand it.

The present amount of about thirty-three cents per scholar will not do much towards keeping a school up for six months in a year; and the various modes of taxation proposed, whether by State, town, county or district tax, will make but little difference, as the whole weight has to be borne by the people. A tax that would keep free schools for even six months, would be very large. Why should we place in this constitution an amount that we may be sorry for, when we know that from time to time the Legislature can and will regulate the matter.

The question recurring upon Mr. J. D. PIERCE's amendment, the same was carried.

The question then recurring upon Mr.

LEACH's substitute as amended, it was not sustained.

Mr. BUSH moved to amend Mr. CORNELL's substitute by striking out "shall" and inserting "may."

Mr. BUSH—I am opposed to the provision, as reported by the committee, and in favor of the amendment. The provision as reported gives the power to raise revenue sufficient to make schools free:—first, to the township, and in case of deficiency, the deficit to be raised by the school district. Experience has shown us that great inequality in taxation will exist in different locations of the State; it but proposes to make permanent in the constitution the system that was commenced under the liberal provisions of our present constitution by the statutes of 1838. The Legislature then, actuated by the purest patriotism, provided that any deficiency that might exist, after using their proportion of the primary school interest fund, might be raised upon the taxable property of the school district. The inequality that existed in the districts was so great, and so apparent, that the system fell at once into disrepute. One district would, by economy, cause a school to be kept up without resorting to oppressive taxation; another, perhaps, in the same township, by prodigality and extravagance, levied a tax upon the property of their district, ostensibly for the support of schools, which the property holders were neither able nor willing to bear. This evil existed in some portions of the State to so great an extent as to effect the relative value of real estate, and necessarily led to a modification of the law. I therefore am opposed to the provision as reported, believing that the same evils would result from its operation, and the consequences would be more disastrous from a constitutional provision, in consequence of permanency, than from a repealable law.

The amendment provides that a tax shall be levied upon the whole taxable property of the State, and shall, when collected, be distributed among the districts, in proportion to the number of scholars, in the same manner as the primary school fund is now distributed. As a friend of universal education, I go for this measure, believing that the whole property of the State should be taxed for the education of the children of the State. Under this system, schools may be free, and will be free, if wisdom characterize the action of those whose duty it becomes to carry out this principle. The only question with me is this: the amendment provides that the Legislature shall provide for levying a tax. &c. I would prefer the word may to the word shall, although probably the effect will be about the same. Action cannot be enforced until it is deemed expedient—an imperious mandate is as important as a mere permission, unless sanctioned by the public will; and when so sanctioned, either is effectual. The principle contained in the amendment I am in favor of, but would prefer a slight change in the language, lest it might lead to an impression that by our action, we were increasing the burdens of the people, when, if one thing, more than all others called this Convention together, it was that by remodeling the Constitution, taxation would be reduced.

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend section 3 by striking out all after "shall," in first line, and inserting "provide for a system of primary schools, by which a school shall be kept up and supported in each school district, at least three months in every year; and any school district neglecting to keep up and support such a school, may be deprived of its equal proportion of the interest of the public fund. And the Legislature may levy a tax on the whole taxable property of the several townships or cities of this State for the support of said schools."

On motion of Mr. BAGG, the word "up" was stricken out wherever it occurs in the amendment.

Mr. BRITAIN—I am glad to see the feeling in favor of free schools as expressed in this Convention, and that the prevailing sentiment appears to be, that it is proper to make it obligatory, either now, or at some future time, upon the Legislature, to provide for them. I believe that the feeling of the people is in favor of free schools; but there is a feeling of a different description. It is that of the property holders. They are possessed of great influence—they well know how to defeat the will of the great body of the people on this subject, and thereby leave the education of the youth solely in the hands of parents or guardians. That is certainly the case, as they seem unmindful of the fact that property is always more lightly taxed in an educated than in an ignorant community.

We should provide for two things: one is equal taxation; the other, that the rising generation shall be instructed. But it has been said that the Legislature had the power, and we are asked why they did not exercise that right. I answer, that the will of the people has been defeated by the talents of men like the gentleman from Wayne. Numerous petitions were received last winter by the Legislature, praying for free schools. Why was it not granted? Not because there was a feeling against it; but because those opposed to it pointed to the assembling of this Convention—that it had better be left until that time.

I am not satisfied with this amendment, because it surrenders the principle. If it cannot be established for six months, let it be for three; but I hope that we shall not be satisfied with any amendment short of that. Every collection of taxes by a district, is liable to be unequal.

This would be extremely unwise and unjust. The true theory of government, as understood at the present day, requires the whole property of the State to support the government of the State, instituted for the protection of said property. And no fact has been more satisfactorily established than the fact that the property of the State can more cheaply educate the people of the State, and maintain the government over an educated people, than it can support a government over an uneducated people; and that a tax for educational purposes is but an interest tax for the protection of property, and should be paid equally by all taxable property protected.

If these premises be true, the duty of this Convention must be apparent. It is alike bound by justice and sound policy to provide, by a tax upon the whole property, for the most economical and perfect protection of the whole property, instead of leaving it subject to the payment of onerous taxes for the support of government, over a population but half educated by the limited means heretofore drawn with so much injustice from parents and guardians, who possess comparatively but a small share of the property of the State.

There is another argument in favor of free schools, which addresses itself to higher motives, and the soundness of which is perhaps quite as well established as the former. It is this: the children of the State are the property of the State, and entitled to support, education and occupation, whether their immediate guardians are able to give it to them or not.

This theory, resting upon the character, and resulting from the obligations of our civil compact, formed for the purpose of supporting, protecting and benefitting each other, claims that the present generation is bound by the strongest obligations of duty, to support, educate and qualify for self-government, the rising generation; and so many means are already provided by law for the accomplishment of these desirable ends, that to a discriminating mind, the only wonder is, that more direct, just and efficient means have not been adopted for the accomplishment of so desirable an object. But, Mr. Chairman, the most difficult questions connected with this subject are, the best method of raising the means, and of insuring their economical expenditure. If you raise the whole amount by a State tax, there may be difficulty in securing an economical expenditure, as the immediate interests of persons interested with the expenditure, will be to draw as copiously from the fund as practicable. If you raise a part of it by State tax, and permit the districts or townships to raise the balance by district or township tax or a capitation tax, or by rate bills, as they may deem expedient, some will raise by district, some by township, and some by capitation tax, while others will collect by rate bills, from parents and guardians.

The property of a district supporting its schools exclusively by a tax upon property, would pay a higher tax than that of a township supporting its schools in part upon rate bills; dissatisfaction would inevitably be the consequence, and the system might be broken down by the crafty property holder, before it received a fair trial. I think that all the burdens we impose should be imposed equally. That the best method of accomplishing this will be to raise a large portion of the school moneys by a State tax, and the balance by a uniform tax, as far as the interests of education will permit, beyond the control of the district. A school in every district should be free during a part of each year, to all scholars residing in the district, and made free from expense to all who are unable to pay; and also made as nearly free from expense to all as shall be consistent with a guarantee of an economical expenditure of the public moneys; and the tax for the support of such schools should, as far as practicable, be a State tax.

Mr. CRARY—By the present system we have about 33 cents per scholar—the tax upon the district—the residue raised by a rate bill. We have thus three sources of revenue at the present time, and many persons are not prepared to go further than the method suggested by the substitute. Some wish to make it imperative, but I do not think that it is desirable to levy a tax, and I will give my reasons.

It is a pretty thing to have a beautiful theory, but sometimes the practice is very different. Difficulties will arise under the general tax system. If you go and levy a tax—a tax for the whole State—who will regulate the prices to be paid for teachers in the districts? If left to the district, what will they make the expenditure? They may pay their teacher forty dollars per month and have but a few scholars. There will not be that care which is required at present, and the chief expense will be thrown upon the more wealthy portion of the State. It would be the best to leave it open; let the Legislature say whether it shall be by towns or counties, or by districts; making it imperative that in two, four or six years, a free system of schools shall be established. If we embody in the constitution, to take immediate effect, the substitute of the gentleman from Genesee, we shall not convince the people that we have done one thing towards lessening the expense, for we cannot carry his proposition into effect, short of a tax of $100,000 for the State; it will probably be more, but I am taking a low estimate. Now, if in this constitution you impose a tax upon the people of this magnitude, how much will they thank you for it? They will say, we sent you to lighten our burdens; you have made them greater.

I think that it must be left to the Legislature. It is, I think, the voice of the Convention to have a free school system—it is my wish—but we must not impose too heavy a burthen to accomplish this object; for if we do, the people will not sustain our action.

On motion of Mr. AXFORD, the committee, through their chairman, reported back to the Convention, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, (22d day,) June 27.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY.

"Article —, Militia," was read a third time, passed, and referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology.

The Article entitled "Executive Department" coming up for a third reading,

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, it was laid upon the table.

Mr. HASCALL's resolution of yesterday being under consideration, he modified the same so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That during the adjournment voted this morning, the per diem of members of the Convention be suspended. Also, the per diem of officers, except such as shall remain at their duties at the Capitol.

Mr. ALVORD moved to indefinitely postpone the same, and the yeas and nays being demanded, the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. R. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Chandler, Crary, Crouse, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Gale, Graham, Harvey, Hathaway, Kinne, Leach, Lee, Marvin, Mason, Moore, Mosher, Mowry, Prevost, Raynale, Roberts, M. Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Wells, Whitemore—44.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Britain, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chapel, Choate, Church, S. Clark, Conner, Danforth, Daniels, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hascall, Hixon, Kingsley, Lovell, Morrison, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Whipple, Withersell, Woodman, President—44.

So the motion to indefinitely postpone was lost.

Mr. ALVORD moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

"And all members who have been heretofore, are now, and who may be hereafter absent, and also those who remain at the Capitol during the adjournment, shall receive no per diem"

When, on motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. J. BARTOW in the Chair.

"Article —, Seat of Government," being under consideration,

Mr. ALVORD moved to strike out all after "the," in 1st line, and insert "City of Detroit in the County of Wayne."

Mr. KINGSLEY said the committee who reported this article were unanimously in favor of locating the seat of government permanently, where it now is; and he was not aware of any difference of opinion on the subject amongst the members of the Convention. There might have been some other propositions talked about, with the view of entertaining the people of this village, but there was not a single person, he believed, who seriously entertained the idea of its removal. If the gentleman from Wayne was really serious in offering the amendment, he [Mr. K.] would wish to hear his reasons. He did not believe any reasons could be assigned for removing the capitol. It had come here without any particular influence to favor it. There was no city or village here at the time—those now residing here have had an equal chance. When self interest could not be gratified by the permanent location of the capitol, the Legislature cast about, and fixed upon this place. I think [said Mr. K.] it is pretty well located. It is a pretty place, and a healthy place. It may be a little too far south. An extensive country lies to the north of this place—rich in agricultural resources, and which in time will be settled with a dense population. At any rate, the city of Detroit should not ask for it. It is more for their interest that it should remain here. The country will be settled with more rapidity—plank roads and rail roads will be extended into the interior, and Detroit, as a commercial city, will receive far more benefit from such improvement, than if the Legislature sat for forty days, once in two years, in the city. He [Mr. K.] would like to have it removed to Ann Arbor. The people of Jackson would probably like to have it there. So of Marshall—but they cannot have it. Let Detroit be satisfied with what they have. There is a great commercial city; they have advantages which none other in the State possesses. The interests of the State required the seat of government to be established here, and he believed there was no disposition among the delegates of the Convention to remove it.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to insert New Buffalo, in the county of Berrien.

Mr. ALVORD—I can assure my friend from Washtenaw, that I never was more serious in my life. The gentleman asks for reasons. I ask, what reasons induced the change from the city of Detroit? One reason is, because we want it changed. We want it in the city of Detroit, where it should have remained. It is a notorious fact that the people of this State, generally, think it was the greatest humbug that it was ever removed. Stuck out here in the woods—inaccessible—in the midst of a forest—where the delegates to the Convention and members of the Legislature are constantly annoyed with mosquitos—for the life and soul of me, I never saw such mosquitos—they are large enough, and have tenacity enough, to hold out through the winter.

Detroit, sir, is the commercial metropolis. There the people do their business. Those who do business at the seat of government, do their commercial business at Detroit. It is more accessible than any other place in the State. A circumscribed circle around this place may be accommodated; but how are the great masses of the people accommodated? How is the vast population that will cover our Upper Peninsula to be accommodated? They will have to come to the commercial metropolis before they can get here. It is the business place—the outlet of the State—and is the place that common sense would dictate as the seat of government. I admit [said Mr. A.] that a few here are accommodated; but, I ask, if a few are to be accommodated at the expense of the many? I do believe that the people of this State desire the change of the location of the capital; and I should not think I did my duty to my constituents and the people of the State, unless I defined my position on this question.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I was not much surprised at the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. ALVORD;] but I was surprised when the gentleman told us he was in earnest—that he was never more serious in his life. With my opinion of the gentleman's good sense, I could not reconcile it. What would he do? The capitol has been located here three years. About the propriety or impropriety of locating it here at the time, I take no issue. The gentleman from Washtenaw has given us the reasons for proposing its continuance in the present location. Those reasons have weight with me, and will also have weight with the Convention.

The main argument of the gentleman from Wayne is, that we are infested with mosquitos, and that they are of a peculiar kind—of large stature, and possess great tenacity of life—that they will continue to live in winter. I, sir, [said Mr. VAN V.,] have not been troubled with them. I have formed no acquaintance with associates of that kind. He asks us how we have been accommodated here. I answer, I have been well accommodated; I have had all the accommodations I require, and so far as my intercourse with the inhabitants has extended, I am constrained to say. I never fell into a community where I was treated with more kindness and hospitality. I think of all locations, this is the most proper. The argument that we are isolated from the world, is an advantage. We are clear of outsiders and lobbies. This is a proper place, sir.

But there is another argument over and above all others; like Pharaoh's lean kine, it swallows up all the others. The character and faith of the State are pledged. Individuals have come here and invested their all, in view of the location here for all time to come. It would be worse than robbery to those who have come here under the auspices of the State and invested their property, to remove the capitol. The gentleman from Wayne says there is a strong sentiment in favor of removing to Detroit. Sir, it is not so. The sentiment of the people, so far as I know it, is against the removal of the capitol. If ever the capitol of Michigan be removed, it will be farther into the interior of the State.

Mr. ALVORD—I did not intend saying anything disrespectful of the people of Lansing, and I believe the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH,] has been treated with much hospitality. I have seen it in our streets and elsewhere. The reason why the gentleman has not been troubled with the bites of the mosquitos, may be attributed to the discriminating taste of those little insects—to their choice in the article of food.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—If the statement of the gentleman from Wayne is correct, there must have come a change over Wayne county. In 1847 the delegation of Wayne voted for its removal here.

Mr. FRALICK said he had the honor of having a seat in the Legislature of '47, in part representing Wayne county. He voted for the location at Lansing, and had not yet regretted the vote he gave on that occasion. He had entertained the opinion then that it was the best move for the whole people of the State, and he entertained the same now. His colleague seemed to intimate that the capitol was located here for the benefit of some few individuals. That was not the case. The capitol was located on a school section, and a large amount of money had accrued to the school fund from its location here. He [Mr. F.] believed that it was more for the benefit of Detroit than it should remain where it is. The only question at the time of the removal was, whether it should remain in Detroit till some accommodation could be had here. There was some inconvenience felt the first winter; but where ever was a new country settled without some difficulty? He recollected the time when it was as difficult for those settled twenty-five miles from Detroit to get to that city, as it is to get here. Let the capital be located permanently here, and in a very few years there will be every convenience for getting here.

There is, [said Mr. F.] another point of view in which this question ought to be considered. All the southern and eastern counties have had the benefit of the patronage of the State. They have had the Southern and Central Railroads built; Detroit has had the benefit of those. When we talk of taxation, we wish to bring the whole people in. When benefits are to be conferred, we wish them to be confined to our locality. They have got a splendid country here. It only wants to be seen to settle it, and make it one of the finest parts of the State.

The question was taken on Mr. J. D. PIERCE's amendment, which was lost.

Mr. ALVORD's amendment was negatived.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of "Article —, Elections."

Mr. MORRISON moved to strike out the words included between the word "inhabitant," in third line of section one, and the word "shall," in fifth line, and to insert "of the age aforesaid, who may be a resident of the State at the time of the signing of this Constitution."

Mr. RAYNALE offered the following substitute for section one:

"In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of 21 years, having resided in this State six months next preceding an election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, having resided in this State two years in all, shall be entitled to vote at all elections: Provided, Such inhabitant shall have resided in this State for the six months next preceding such election; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote, except in the township or ward of which he is an actual resident."

Mr. MORRISON said the amendment he proposed was a provision incorporated in the old constitution; no evil had resulted from it, and he saw no reason why it should not be incorporated in the present. There are inhabitants now in the State to whom the elective franchise might with great propriety be extended. He was disposed to give them all the privileges of citizens, as far as it could be done by the State.

Mr. BAGG concurred in the views entertained by Mr. MORRISON. He would cheerfully support the amendment offered.

Mr. RAYNALE said—The gentleman who offered the amendment [Mr. MORRISON] seems to think there is the same necessity for incorporating this provision in the present constitution as there was when the old constitution was framed. Our State Government was formed under the ordinance of '87 Had the inhabitants at that time been all aliens, it would have been perfectly consistent for them, under the authority of that ordinance, to have gone on and framed a constitution and State government. We are now in a different situation; we have a State government, and we have the right to say who shall be electors. I [said Mr. R.] was in favor of it at that time—in '35. At that time every white male inhabitant had a right to vote. I am in favor of the principle now, if the circumstances were the same as to require it in the present constitution. I am in favor of every white male citizen being entitled to vote on some correct principle, and a principle that can be applied to foreigners or aliens; but I think people coming here from a foreign country ought to have time to prepare themselves for exercising those privileges under our institutions. The time I propose in the substitute I have offered is two years. I think that is liberal—it would not be onerous or severe. It would give a man time to make himself acquainted with our institutions. It appears to me, the section I have sent up embraces the most rational plan; and that it will meet with the wishes and views of the people better than any other that can be adopted. As to whether the sons of those who have the right to vote under the old constitution will have a right to vote, I cannot say. All under the old constitution will have the right to vote, and all born here will have the right to vote.

Mr. R. considered it too long to require a person to remain five years and become naturalized under the laws of the United States before he could vote. He would only require a man to have time to become acquainted with our institutions; he would not require him to have papers in his pocket to entitle him to vote.

Mr. HASCALL—The privilege of voting ought to be founded on the knowledge of our institutions. We have in our borders great numbers who have emigrated to this country who do not speak our language and have not become sufficiently acquainted with our institutions to vote intelligibly. The provision reported by the committee requires them to go through the process prescribed by the laws of the United States, before they can become citizens or have the right of voting. In two or three years they will become acquainted with our system of government and can vote intelligibly.

The amendment of the gentleman from Calhoun would operate unequally. Those who come in a week before the adoption of this constitution will not have to go through this form; those who come in one week after, will. There can be no material difference in their intelligence. It would operate unequally if incorporated in the constitution.

The amendment offered by Mr. MORRISON did not prevail.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to amend as follows:

Add at the end of section 1: "All foreigners who shall have resided in this State one year previous to the adoption of this constitution, shall be entitled to vote at any election; provided that they shall not have such right after five years, if, during that period, they do not become naturalized, and be able to read and speak the English language."

Mr. WITHLRELL moved to amend the above by striking out, "and be able to read the English language."

Mr. SUTHERLAND said—In the county of Saginaw over a thousand Germans are located, where there are but few of our citizens. They are desirous of organizing school districts, where there is not a sufficient number of our own citizens to fill the offices. Unless there is some provision placed in the constitution, for the time being, to allow them to hold office, and to vote, they will be unable to enjoy the privileges to which they are entitled. But, though they ought to be put in possession of those privileges to which their adventurous spirit entitles them, care should be taken that they do not abuse those privileges. There is a disposition among them to colonize and settle together, to encourage their own habits and maintain their own language. If this is encouraged, it may take generations to adapt them to our language and the genius of our institutions. If this is struck out, they will speak and teach their own language—they will keep up in their schools their own language, and that alone. Adopt this amendment with the proviso, and they will have the right of voting and filling those offices, and in five years they will read and speak the English language. They are intelligent men. They speak the German and French, and some of them the English language. They are inclined to be in-lustrious and peaceable and to learn our language. If this provision is adopted, they will learn our language and adopt our habits.

Mr. WITHERELL had made the motion to strike out, because he thought it would be difficult to carry out the provision submitted by the gentleman from Saginaw. It may require a committee of school masters to ascertain and decide when a man knows the English language, and can speak it. A man may be supposed to speak the English language, if he can communicate his ideas in a broken manner; or he may be required to speak fluently and grammatically. It was on account of its impracticability that he proposed to strike out. He [Mr. W.] knew many of those emigrants from Germany and Holland, who speak the German and French languages, and some of them the English language. A large portion of the emigrants are well educated; many of them who are day laborers, are good Latin scholars. In Prussia their system of schools is better than ours. They are at liberty to learn any branch of education, music and the languages. Education is there free; and parents are obliged to send their children to school. He [Mr. W.] believed the whole body of Germans in this country could read and write.

Mr. KINGSLEY believed the German emigrants were, generally speaking, intelligent men. He did not understand why they should vote at one time and not at another. He did not wish them to learn the English language too fast. They may be full as honest as they are.

Mr. ALVORD was in favor of a shorter probation than five years. He would require them to declare their intention to become citizens, and then in one or two years allow them to vote. With regard to requiring them to read and write the English language, he was opposed to that. Many of the French, who are old inhabitants, cannot speak English, or speak it imperfectly. In its application, the gentleman will see the unfairness of the proposition.

Mr. HASCALL thought it best to let them work out their citizenship under the laws of the United States, for the reason that those who wish to become voters will prepare themselves; but to allow them to vote indiscriminately would be extending the privilege to those who do not wish to know or be acquainted with our institutions. If there is an intelligent foreigner who wishes to become a citizen, he will file his intentions, and in due time become a citizen. In the mean time he will be studying our institutions, and become better enabled to vote than if he were not required to do so. The committee took pains to prevent any injury to the State from indiscriminate voting, by foreigners coming into the State.

Mr. GALE thought gentlemen took a singular view of the question; one which he did not understand as according with the principles of justice. He did not know why foreigners coming one day, should be voters, and those coming the next, should be cut off from the privilege for five years. There could not be a shadow of difference in the qualification. It ought to be fixed on some more just principle. A great complaint is made of the probation foreigners have to go through. Let us reflect, and look at our young men; are they not as well prepared to vote at sixteen years of age, as foreigners after two years residence? Why keep our boys in a state of probation, and put the foreigners ahead of them? And yet they decay this probationary state. It looks to me [said Mr. G.] to be nothing but buncombe. All I ask is, that it should be founded simply on the principles of justice.

The question was taken on Mr. WITHERELL's amendment, which was lost; and Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment was negatived.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to amend section 1 by inserting in second line, after "election," where it first occurs, as follows: "and every white male inhabitant above the age aforesaid, who has resided in this State two years next preceding the adoption of this Constitution, and has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, pursuant to law."

Mr. HANSCOM said—His reasons for proposing the amendment, were in part to meet the objections raised to excluding foreigners entirely from voting, unless they went through the forms prescribed by the naturalization laws of the United States. A distinction might with propriety be made between those who have been in two years, and those who have come in since. He was disposed to go as far as we could in giving them privileges, but there must be some limit—it was idle to oppose it. He would propose two years as the limitation, and would guard it by requiring them to take the oath required by the United States, that they intend in fact to become citizens of the United States.

Mr. TIFFANY saw no reason why it should not be made to apply to those who shall hereafter come to reside here, as well as to those who are now residents here.

Mr. MOORE saw no propriety in extending the right of voting to foreigners, except in the regular mode. The amendments proposed struck at the very root of the institutions of our country. He was disposed to go on the old principle.

Mr. BUSH was in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM.] As the gentleman from St. Joseph had observed, this was a very important subject. The gentleman asks if it is proper to make this provision applicable to persons now resident in the State, why not make it applicable to persons who may come in hereafter, and for all future time. There is one reason. We know the character and disposition of the inhabitants here, but we know not what it may be with regard to future immigration.

In '35 every inhabitant was made a voter. He [Mr. B.] had never seen any inconvenience grow out of it. It was liberal. He would ask if it had not had its influence in bringing many worthy citizens to the State of Michigan. If so it was worthy of consideration—but at present he would not go for a provision so liberal, not because it had been disastrous or attended with inconvenience, but that the institutions of our country may be protected—that they may not be allowed to vote till they have adapted themselves to our institutions.

I believe [said Mr. B.] the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oakland is sufficiently liberal, and I hope it may be adopted. After a man has declared his intentions, going again into open court, and while other business is going on, subscribing to an oath, is a matter of form; it amounts to but very little.

Mr. BAYNALE would ask if, when a foreigner applies for admission, he takes an oath?

Mr. HANSCOM—Yes, of the most solemn character, renouncing allegiance to all other governments.

Mr. FRALICK was in favor of the article as it stood, and none other. He believed that nineteen twentieths of the foreigners cannot get a knowledge of our institutions short of that time. When we became a State we were in a different situation. There were very few but what were natural born citizens, or who had not resided a long time here. If the right of voting is worth any thing, guards should be thrown around it. Our rights may be voted away by this class of voters. He [Mr. F.] did not believe that the most respectable class of foreigners wished it; for their own credit they wished that they should be informed. It is not desired by the best class of foreigners that the right of suffrage should be made too cheap. It is too much like driving cattle to market. They are imposed upon by designing demagogues. They do not appreciate the right so much as they would if they had to wait five years. The voters would be of the best class of emigrants, if required to go through this probation. Mr. F. did not think it was called for, or that it would result in good, or promote the best interests of the State.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend by striking out "two years," and inserting "one year."

If there was any propriety in granting the privilege to those who had been inhabitants two years, he thought it might be extended to those who had been in but one. He was desirous that it should be extended to those emigrants from Europe who settled here in '49. There were emigrants from Germany and other places, who were well educated, intelligent men, and who were as well acquainted with our institutions as many of our citizens.

He [Mr. M.] would ask, who are the men that have emigrated from Europe? They are those who have been trodden down and crushed by tyranny. The liberality of Michigan has induced thousands to settle in this Peninsular State. That foreigners should be here five years, to know what is required of them before they can exercise the elective franchise, is too much. He knew many foreigners who had studied the English language, and the institutions of this country, and who were as well informed as many who were born here, and who would exercise the privileges they may be permitted to enjoy with as much propriety.

Mr. N. PIERCE said he knew the present constitution was a liberal one, and he thought it was right. When we came into the Union there were but few here who came from other countries. It gave us more numbers and efficiency. But we have become more numerous. Many have come in since, and the constitution did not apply to them; they have had to look on or comply with the United States laws. It is better to adhere to these laws, and not jump off. We have become so numerous that we can carry on the operation systematically now. Let them who have come in since, take up citizenship under the United States laws. Better leave the election law as it is. It seems to me it is better. It seems to me it is consistent. I have nothing to say about the intelligence of foreigners; but if the law of the United States is proper, we should comply with it; if not, we should ask Congress to alter it.

The motion was lost.

Mr. GOODWIN moved to strike out "two years next preceding the adoption of this constitution," and insert "one year prior to the signing of this constitution."

Mr. G. said it would be perceived that the proposition he offered, if adopted, would give the right of suffrage to all aliens who should have resided in the State one year previous to the signing of the constitution. When our present constitution was formed, when the general qualification of electors required citizenship, a provision gave to all the white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, residing in the State at the time of the signing the constitution, the right of suffrage. This was adopted under these considerations. In the enumeration on which was based our claim to admission into the Union, aliens were included; and when the constitution was under consideration, it was supposed that all the inhabitants participated and turned their attention to it, and that they were better prepared to vote than if they had resided here a much longer time when constitutional questions were not agitated. In that view, the provision was inserted in the old constitution, and adopted with it.

Sir, (said Mr. G.,) there are in the city in which I am a resident, a great many aliens who are active, intelligent and industrious; who participate constantly with us in public affairs, and take an interest in the affairs of the State. Their friends and connexions in the country take an interest also in public affairs, and an interest is extended to the various subjects connected with the revision of the constitution. The same reasons I had reference to in the first constitution, apply to the present. Take the period of one year—they will have been here when the act passed the Legislature for holding a Convention, and during the election of delegates to the Convention; here, also, while the subjects are before the Convention, and in common with others, have their attention turned to them.

Hence, in reference to a large and valuable class of society, to which I have alluded, and also in reference to those views which were entertained at the framing of our first constitution, I propose the amendment. Instead of giving the privilege of voting to those resident at the time, we will take in only those who were here during the whole process and discussion in the framing of the constitution.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. GOODWIN, and lost.

Mr. WALKER moved to strike out "has resided," and insert "shall have resided;" also strike out the words "next preceding the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. WALKER would extend the provision, and make it applicable to all future time. A large number of emigrants are coming in and settling in our northern counties, with none among them entitled to hold office. Still they are brought under taxation, and he [Mr. W.] did not think it proper, or for the interests of the country to cut them off for five years from the rights of citizenship. If the principle of the amendment were adopted, its action would be self-regulating. If the principle be correct, as applicable to those now resident, there could be no reason assigned why the same relief should not be granted to those coming in hereafter. It would hold out inducements for the better class of emigrants from Europe to settle among us—those who come with a desire to enjoy the privileges of our institutions. But, from whatever motives they come here, it is the best policy to allow them as soon as may be, to acquire information and participate in the affairs of government. If we adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Oakland, and do not extend it hereafter, we shall soon have whole communities in the same situation as those mentioned by the gentleman from Saginaw—large communities without one person among them qualified to hold the office of tax collector.

Mr. W. believed if a more liberal policy were adopted, it would be an inducement for a more respectable class to settle in Michigan.

Mr. HANSCOM was disposed to be liberal; but as far as he knew, the right of franchise was considered the most important. We have gone further than any European government—we allow foreigners after a residence of five years, and going through certain forms, to enjoy all the privileges of citizenship. The gentleman from Macomb asks, if the principle be good, why not apply it to all future time? The reason is obvious. I would [said Mr. H.] put another limitation beyond the limit of two years. I would require them to file their intentions of becoming citizens; not that I think it important, but as proving that they estimate the benefit, and have the disposition to exercise the right of voting. Suppose a person should remain here ten years and be so indifferent to this matter as not to file such declaration—would it not argue as to the person who had neglected those forms, a perfect indisposition to become acquainted with our institutions?

While I would go thus far, I would not place such power in the hands of a body of men who cannot speak our language, and who may override all the institutions of our country. The gentleman says it is hard not to allow them this privilege, as we are going to tax them. Well, sir, what government ever existed, where a person was allowed citizenship in five years, except in the case of individuals, and by special enactment. I believe in throwing some guards around the elective franchise. We should require some intelligence—some little training—some knowledge of our affairs amongst our Dutch and German population, before we extend the privilege to them. We should say to them, “unless you become naturalized you shall not have the control of our government; we will reserve it for our native born citizens, and to those who have become citizens.” Would it not be doing injustice to those who have become citizens? There is a point beyond which it might be dangerous to go.

The amendment offered by Mr. WALKER was not concurred in.

Mr. WITHERELL moved to amend section 1, by inserting after “aforesaid,” in 5th line, “but no person not a citizen of the United States shall be allowed to vote after he may have resided five years in this State, unless he has or shall become naturalized.”

Mr. W. said, under the proposed amendment, all those who have now the right to vote under our present constitution, and who have not thought proper to become naturalized, would be compelled to do so. When we commenced our State government, the right of voting was extended to all our inhabitants. There are many residents in the State who have the right of suffrage under the old constitution, who will not become naturalized—who owe allegiance to foreign governments. They owe no allegiance to the United States. They cannot commit treason against this State, or the United States. This should not be allowed. We extend to them the right hand; we wish and ask them to come and settle among us, provided they take the opportunity, as soon as the law will allow, of becoming citizens. They have all the privileges, without the inconveniences. The proposed amendment would obviate the difficulty. They could not be voters after five years, unless they became naturalized.

Mr. BEESON thought the principle in the amendment offered by Mr. HANSCOM, wrong. He was for protecting the citizens of the State in the privileges they now enjoy. Take some of our western and northern counties; we run the risk of throwing our present citizens into the power of persons who may come here from other countries.

The amendment offered by Mr. WIRRELL was lost.

Mr. HANSCOM'S amendment was then negatived.

Mr. BEESON moved to insert in the 5th line, after the word "election," "if citizens of the United States." He offered it merely to perfect the present section.

Mr. ROBERTSON—That would exclude the descendants of citizens from voting.

Mr. BEESON modified his amendment so as to read "if born within the United States."

The motion did not prevail.

Mr. STOREY moved to strike out the last clause—"who shall have resided for ten days next preceding the election."

Which was lost.

The question was then taken on the substitute offered by Mr. RAYNALE, which was negatived.

Mr. ORR moved to strike the word "white" out of the first section.

Cries of "question, question."

Mr. LEACH hoped gentlemen would not be in such hot haste to have the question taken. There were some who felt an interest in it. He wished to say something on it himself. As the hour for adjournment had arrived, he would move that the committee rise and report progress. Lost.

"Question, question, question."

Mr. N. PIERCE felt bound to advocate the motion. He knew some men who were not so white as others. It might abridge some of their rights of voting, if challenged. He did not know to what grade of color it should apply, as white was no color. Some definite rule should be applied or some persons might be prohibited from voting who should vote.

Mr. GALE rose to say that he was really desirous that Mr. LEACH might have an opportunity of discussing the matter—it was due to him in courtesy.

Mr. WILLIAMS said the petitioners on the subject on which the gentleman from Genesee wished to speak, numbered over six times more than all the petitioners on all the other subjects which had occupied the attention of the Convention.

Mr. S. CLARK hoped the gentleman from Genesee would be allowed to express his views on the subject. It was a subject of much importance. He moved that the committee rise and report back "Article —, Seat of Government," and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and also report progress on "Article —, Elections," and ask leave to sit again.

Which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KINGSLEY, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The article entitled "Seat of Government" was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; when,

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the 37th rule was suspended.

The question being, shall the article pass, it was decided in the affirmative by a unanimous vote.

Mr. N. PIERCE offered the following:

Resolved, That the vote of this Convention to adjourn from Monday, July 1st, until Saturday, July 6th, be and the same is hereby rescinded.

Mr. P. was desirous that the resolution should be rescinded. If members wish, they can go home. A minority of the Convention could adjourn from day to day, and it might gratify them to meet every day in the Hall.

Mr. S. CLARK hoped a vote would be taken without debate.

Mr. HANSCOM said every delegate well knew that the Convention would not meet during the next week. Why not call every thing by its proper name?

Mr. ALVORD was prepared to go for rescinding, though he was aware it would amount to the same thing. A quorum would not be here next week.

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. J. BARTOW in the chair.

"Article —, Elections," being under consideration, and the question being on the motion of Mr. ORR to strike out the word "white," in section 1,

Mr. LEACH said—It is not my intention to enter into a lengthy discussion of the merits of the proposed amendment. I consider it wholly unnecessary to do so, and shall not long detain the committee.

It has been suggested to me that it would be useless to say anything whatever on the subject; that the amendment would not be made; and that all time spent in discussing it would be spent in vain. Now, it is true that I have but little hope that this word "white" will be stricken out; but, in my humble opinion, the probability of defeat is not a good reason why the friends of the measure should neglect or refuse to make the effort. If we make the effort—if we state our position and adduce facts to prove the correctness of our position—if we use our influence and our votes, and then fail, the responsibility will rest upon others, and not us. We shall have discharged our duty to our constituents and our State, whatever may be the final result.

I am one, sir, that believes this amendment should be made. Nor am I alone in this opinion. Very many of my constituents—I trust a majority of them—agree with me in this matter. I judge this from the fact that every man who voted for me was familiar with my views upon this subject, and very well knew what my course would be in relation to it. Hence, in advocating the extension of the right of suffrage to the colored citizen—to all citizens, without regard to color—I am not only obeying the dictates of my own conscience, but am doing that which my constituents expect at my hands, and which, I have reason to hope, will meet with their approval.

But, sir, I am not entirely without hope of the success of the pending amendment. This is a democratic Convention, and if the spirit as well as the name of democracy is here in the ascendent, I do not see how the measure can fail. It is emphatically a democratic principle; it is an attempt to extend to a class of our citizens a right of which they have long been deprived, and to which they are as much entitled as any member upon this floor. Why, then, should we anticipate defeat? Why lay down our arms and surrender without an effort?

Sir, we have heard much about progress and progressive democracy; and I trust it is not all idle talk. It means something—it means more, perhaps, than conservative politicians are willing to admit. It is an age of political and governmental progress. The course of events in our own country attests it; the movements of politicians and people in the old world demonstrate it beyond the possibility of a doubt. Everywhere the people are awakening to a sense of their rights. The most ordinary observer cannot have failed to perceive this, nor the most obstinate conservative to admit it as an established fact.

The same ardent love of liberty, the same bitter hatred of oppression which led to the separation of the American colonies from the mother country still exists. Their strength has increased with age, and they have spread to other lands and are lodged in the hearts of the people of other climes.

Sir, the principles to which I refer are embodied in the Declaration of American Independence. I am aware that this reference to the Declaration is a common affair, but that has become a political text book to the American people. The anniversary of our national Independence is at hand; and then, sir, amid celebrations and rejoicings, these truths will be proclaimed in all parts of our country. From Maine to Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, man's inalienable "right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," will be asserted by a thousand orators, and received as undoubted truth by a patriotic people. And it is truth. It is a reality and a truth worthy of every man's consideration.

Sir, what led to the declaration of these truths by our forefathers? Simply the assumption by Great Britain of the right to bind the colonies "in all cases whatsoever,"—of the right to tax those to whom the privilege of representation was denied. And it is against this very principle of taxation without representation that I, and all who act with me in this matter, enter our protest. The American doctrine, as promulgated by our fathers, and generally admitted by us, is that taxation and representation are twin sisters, and should ever go hand in hand. Taxation without representation is rank injustice. All admit this to be true in most cases, but I do not see how it can be departed from at all, in any case, without gross injustice, and absolute danger to our free institutions. To foreigners who come among us we extend the privileges of naturalization and of citizenship. We say to them that they must bear a fair proportion of the expenses of government, but we will not impose these burdens upon them without granting them all the rights and immunities of native born citizens. By complying with the reasonable requirements of our naturalization laws, they become citizens, and cannot be taxed without their own consent. This, sir, is right; it is liberal and just. We lose nothing by being liberal to foreigners, to all who come among us and adopt our country as their home and the home of their posterity. Instead of keeping them among us as aliens and enemies, we make them good citizens and firm friends.

Mr. Chairman, taxation for the support of government is absolutely necessary. All countries have found it necessary. We must have legislative, executive and judicial officers, and as these officers serve the people, it is but just that they should derive their support from the people. Now, there is no other equitable way of apportioning these taxes among those who are protected by the government, than by causing every man to pay in proportion to the value of his possessions. The property of the State should support the government of the State, and, as I remarked yesterday, should educate the children of the State. Taxation should not be borne exclusively by any particular portion of the people. All should contribute according to their means. And such is the case; all do contribute according to the value of what they possess, and consequently in proportion to the amount of protection which they receive from government.

Now, sir, as all aid, or are liable to aid, in the support of government, where is the justice in excluding any particular class from a voice in the election of the officers of government? Why deprive a particular class of the privileges of the elective franchise? And why, especially, make the color of a man's skin the test of his qualification for discharging the duties of an elector? By what principle of democracy—by what principle of equity is this test sustained? If there is to be a distinction made—if one class in community is to enjoy privileges which are denied to others, let us have a rule adapted for determining who are to be the favored ones, which shall at least have the appearance of being reasonable and just. The distinction as now existing, founded on color, is ridiculously absurd, and radically unjust. It originated in prejudice, and it is sustained by prejudice. No other reason can be given for the adoption of this test, nor for its continuance to the present time.

Sir, let us look at a few of the objections that are made to extending the elective franchise to colored persons. We hear it said by many on all sides, that their immorality and intellectual inferiority disqualify them for the discharge of the duties of an elector. Now, of some colored men, this is unquestionably true. And it is equally true of some white men. We find some Germans, French, Irish, English, Scotch, and native born Americans, who are entirely unfit and incompetent to discharge properly the responsible duties that devolve upon every freeman. But do we proscribe the whole class on this account? Do we even deny the right of suffrage to the individuals themselves? Do we say to the unfortunate Irishman who has sought in our country that freedom which is denied him in his native land, because he cannot read our language, or perhaps cannot read at all, that all political rights are denied him? Do we say he shall never approach the ballot box as a citizen? shall never participate in the election of those who are to make and execute the laws under which he is to live? But, sir, I have yet to learn that our colored population, as a class, are more immoral than those of a lighter color. One thing is certain; many of our best and most intelligent and influential citizens, in those parts of the State where the colored population is most numerous, consider them competent to discharge properly the duties of electors, and ask us to extend to them this privilege. I hold in my hand a petition from four hundred and twenty citizens of Wayne county, and among the names I recognise those of many individuals of high standing—names with which we are all familiar, as individuals of talent and influence. Nor are these petitioners members of a single political party. They are members of all parties, and to some extent may be supposed to represent the feelings of all parties in the vicinity from which the petition comes. I will read the petition, which is as follows:

"To the Honorable the Constitutional Convention of the State of Michigan:

"The undersigned citizens of Michigan, county of Wayne, entitled to the elective franchise; respectfully represent:

"That there is a class of persons in this State, differing from us in color, which, as a class, is peaceable, industrious and rapidly improving in its condition as to education and otherwise;

"That, although colored persons are subjected to taxes and all the burdens of government, they are excluded from all participation in its administration;

"That the mere color of the skin seems a very arbitrary rule for granting or withholding the elective franchise; and

"That taxation without representation has never been considered a republican doctrine.

"Your petitioners hope this subject will receive the candid and dispassionate consideration which its importance demands; and that the right of suffrage may be extended to persons of color, under such modifications and qualifications as a just regard for the principles of civil liberty and due consideration for the public good may seem to sanction and require."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the careful attention of delegates to the phraseology of this petition.

Mr. BAGG—Will the gentleman read the names of the petitioners? Coming, as it appears to, from my constituents, I should be glad to know who they are.

Mr. LEACH—That, sir, would require much time, as there are over four hundred of them. Among them, however, I find the following, viz: John Ladue, George R. Griswold, E. Farnsworth, Dr. Duffield, James F. Joy, H. H. Emmons, George C. Bates, A. S. Williams, J. Owen, and others equally well known; equally competent to judge, and honest to decide. Here, sir, we have the testimony of men in whose judgment, sincerity and honesty, we have the utmost confidence. But, aside from this testimony, every man's observation has convinced him that there are many, very many colored men, whose intelligence and high moral worth would place them in the first rank of society, were it not for the color of their skins.

I hold in my hand, sir, the Senate and House documents of the Legislature of 1845, in which I find a report on the subject of colored suffrage, made by Dr. Denton, a democrat of high standing and of the strictest integrity. Speaking of the alleged inferiority of the colored race, he says: "Neither history nor experience sustains the objection. On the contrary, they conclusively refute it. Like other nations, Africa had her season of glory. During it, she was one of the most powerful nations of the world. Her victorious arms had nearly annihilated the Romans. Her black Hannibal will ever be found in the catalogue of the Cæsars and Bonapartes."

A MEMBER—That is incorrect. Hannibal was not a colored man—not a negro.

Mr. LEACH—Well, I am quoting democratic authority, which, I suppose, is the very best kind to quote to a democratic convention. I hope democrats will not question such authority. But the report continues:

"In modern times, one of the greatest writers of the day, celebrated for his intellect and brilliant talents, amid the most brilliant capital in the world—Paris—is Alexander Dumas, a colored man. Europe's first men deem his acquaintance an honor. Many other instances might be mentioned. In this State the objection is decisively exposed by the public exhibition of high talent in public men, under the most unpropitious circumstances. The committee allude to the many public addresses in the State, by persons born in slavery, and denied education.

"In estimating the intellect of colored men, sufficient allowance is not generally made for the effects produced on a race by continued servitude and a denial of education during a series of generations. Reverse the situation of the African and the European—make the one the master, and the other the slave for centuries, and the white man will possess the supposed characteristics of inferiority. To illustrate this, the committee quote the following passage from the celebrated American traveler, Stevens—see his "Greece, Turkey, and Russia;" vol. 2, Harper's edition, page 40:

"I was forcibly struck," says he, "with a parallel between the white serfs of the north of Europe and African bondsmen at home. The Russian boor, generally wanting the comforts which are supplied to the negro on our best ordered plantations, appeared to me to be not less degraded in intellect, character and personal bearing. Indeed, the marks of physical personal degradation were so strong that I was insensibly compelled to abandon certain theories not uncommon among my countrymen at home, in regard to the intrinsic superiority of the white race over all others. Perhaps, too, this impression was aided by my having previously met with Africans of intelligence and capacity, standing upon a footing of perfect equality as soldiers in the Greek army and the Sultans'."

Other testimony might be adduced; but it is wholly unnecessary. We make color the criterion by which to judge of a man's intelligence; but on investigation find that the color of his skin is not an index to the capabilities of his mind. Hence, this objection to negro suffrage amounts to nothing. We might, with equal propriety, make some other physical peculiarity the standard by which to measure a man's rights. Why not take the color of a man's eyes or hair? Why not say that he who has a Roman nose, or a Grecian nose, or a red nose, shall not enjoy the privileges of an elector? Indeed, in very many cases, a red nose would be a far better reason than a black skin for rejecting a man's vote.

But there is another objection, sir, which is always made when the extension of the elective franchise to the African race is spoken of. Thousands there are who raise their hands in holy horror at the thought that it will fill our State with negroes. "We shall be flooded with them," says the objector. "They will come upon us in swarms, like the locusts of Egypt, until the land will be darkened." Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no such fears; and the fears of the most nervous objector may be quieted by referring to States where negroes have long enjoyed this privilege. We there find, sir, that it has no influence—I think I may safely say none—upon the increase of the colored population; and I ask the careful attention of the committee to the facts which I am about to present to prove the correctness of the assertion which I have made.

Since 1792, suffrage in New Hampshire has been unrestricted. Every male citizen twenty-one years of age is a voter. Connecticut has been less liberal. Her constitution, like our own, restricts the right of voting to "white" persons. Now, sir, let us compare the statistics of the colored population of these two States for a period of forty years, and see, if we can, what influence, if any, the different provisions of their constitutions have had upon the increase of the colored population. In 1800 the free colored population of New Hampshire was 818. In 1810 it was 970, showing an increase in ten years of 152, or 19 per cent. In 1800 the free colored population of Connecticut was 5330. In 1810 it was 6453, showing an increase in ten years of 1123, or 21 per cent. In 1820 the free colored population of New Hampshire was 986, showing an increase of only 16, or less than 2 per cent., while in the same period of ten years, the same class in Connecticut had increased to 7844, showing a gain of 1391, or 19 per cent. In 1830 the colored population of New Hampshire was 604, being 382, or about 33 per cent. less than it was ten years previous. In the same period the colored population of Connecticut had increased from 7844, to 8047, being a gain of 203, or about 3 per cent. In 1840 the colored population of New Hampshire had fallen to 537, showing a loss in ten years of 67, or over 10 per cent., while in the same period, that of Connecticut had increased to 8105, showing a gain of 58, or 1 per cent. During the whole period of forty years, from 1800 to 1840, the free colored population of New Hampshire had fallen from 818 to 537, showing a loss of 281, or 33 per cent.; while during the same period that of Connecticut had risen from 5330, to 8105, showing an increase of 2775, or about 50 per cent.

Mr. CRARY—It is climate that makes the difference.

Mr. LEACH—Yes it is climate. We have an admission of the fact—an admission which I did not expect; but the facts bearing upon this point are so strong, and point so clearly to the conclusion, that gentlemen are constrained to admit its legitimacy. It is climate. This is just what I wanted to prove. It is some other thing than the elective franchise alone, that influences them in their choice of a home. They are governed in their choice of a home by the same considerations which influence us under similar circumstances. So it is in the New England States, and so we have reason to believe it is in all the free States, and in our own. Notwithstanding this, I am willing to admit that some may come among us on account of this privilege, should it be extended to them; but the number thus influenced will be small; and those who would come under such an influence, and who would appreciate the privilege of the elective franchise, would be superior in point of talents and principles to the general mass. From such men we have nothing to fear.

The objection that extending to them equal political privileges would cause an increase of our colored population, is the greatest one that has been urged against the amendment. I have endeavored to show that it is without foundation. Experience in the New England States, where a fair trial has been made, demonstrates that the increase and decrease of that class depends upon other causes and influences than the granting or withholding of the privilege of voting—that the objection does not exist. If, then, the objection has been removed, why may not the privilege be extended to them? Surely we do not wish to trample upon their rights. I have, sir, too much confidence in the justice and liberality of the people of Michigan to believe that they are willing to trample upon the rights of others, unless they consider their own in danger. Africans are men, and have rights. They, sir, are naturally entitled to all the rights which you and I, as individuals of the white race, can claim—to life, liberty, and the right of self government—a fact too often overlooked in discussions on this subject, but a fact which you have acknowledged in the bill of rights. It is there asserted that “all political power is inherent in the people,”—not the white people, nor the black people, to the exclusion of the other class, but in all the people, including every individual of every color and condition.

It is also there declared that “no man nor set of men shall be entitled to exclusive privileges.” Now, sir, consistency requires that you should amend the bill of rights so as to read that all political power is inherent in the white people, and that no set of men except whites shall be entitled to exclusive privileges, or, as justice and an enlightened liberality dictate, carry out the spirit of the bill by allowing all men to participate in the privileges and blessings of self government.

I have thought it my duty to speak in this Convention in behalf of the down-trodden and oppressed. The colored people are few—they have no chance to plead their own cause—they are not represented here. There appears to me to be something small in excluding so small a part of the people from the exercise of their natural rights. It seems an act of “unutterable littleness” to trample on the rights of the weak—an act condemned by every principle of justice, right, and republicanism—an act destitute of every vestige of honor, unless there is honor in the triumph of the strong over the weak, of the giant over the infant, of tyranny over justice.

I know that the committee have reported a separate article, referring the question to the people. If the pending amendment does not prevail, I should wish to have it acted on separately by the people. But I do not approve of deferring it. The question should be settled at once. I would not hold in suspense those deprived of their natural rights; I would not shrink from the responsibility of restoring them, and thereby showing that we are men and true republicans.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—So long as there are two races, the Caucasian race and the Negro race, they cannot amalgamate. If you give them this right you must give them others. There is a difference between natural rights and legal or political rights, but they are often confounded. The right of suffrage is a conventional right or privilege

He [Mr. P.] would say that justice should be extended to all men; at the same time we are not bound to disgrace ourselves in the social circle, to amalgamate and associate with them. If we give them this right we must associate with them in our churches and our legislature. Why not then give our daughters to their sons, and amalgamate the races? There never was a more palpable perversion of truth than that Hannibal was a Negro. The Carthaginians came from Tyre; they were not of the Negro race.

The gentleman seems to apprehend that if we do not adopt the amendment, that there may be apprehension that the separate article to be submitted to the people may not succeed. I [said Mr. P.] am willing to submit it to the people and abide their decision.

Mr. LEACH—I regret that anything has been said here about amalgamation. I am not—and I wish every gentleman in this hall to understand me—I am not, never have been, and never shall be an advocate of amalgamation; and it is not right to impute any such principle to the friends of universal suffrage.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—It would be opening the door to that result.

Mr. LEACH—The view which the gentleman takes is incorrect. We are told if we extend political privileges to colored men, we must also receive them as intimates into our families—must give them our daughters in marriage, and amalgamate the two races. Now, sir, is this the fact? The assumption of the gentleman is, that we must admit into the bosom of our families, and consent to unite with our children in the most sacred ties, all those to whom we extend the right of suffrage. I take this to be a great mistake; and I ask the honorable member if there are not many ignorant and vicious white men to whom he willingly extends the right of suffrage, that he would not receive as inmates of his family, and to whom he would not give his daughter in marriage? We all know, sir, that there are many, very many, of this class.

But, the gentleman tells us there is a great difference between natural rights and conventional rights. Now, sir, it appears to me this is making a distinction where none really exists, particularly as applied to this subject. I hold that right is always right—wrong is always wrong. What is right for one man is right for all men; what is granted to one man should be granted to all. We have no right to make such distinctions as some gentlemen seem anxious to make in this matter. But if there is a real difference between natural and conventional rights, all men certainly have the same natural right to enjoy these conventional rights, because the father of democracy tells us that “all men are created equal.” Make this distinction now and what is the next step? Why, perhaps to disfranchise the poor man, or the man of some particular religious sect, or persons holding obnoxious political principles. Thus you may go on excluding one class after another, from all participation in the affairs of government, until nine-tenths of the people are disfranchised. Sir, the only safe course is to be liberal and extend the right of suffrage to all.

Mr. BAGG—Mr. Chairman: When I find a petition from the city of Detroit, having so many respectable names attached to it, I feel called upon to say something on this sable question. I am opposed to the amendment for ten thousand reasons, but I shall not give them to day. I shall not go to the zoophyte and trace up the numerous gradations in animal life to our noble selves, and say what rank the African holds in the chain. It is sufficient for me to know it is not expedient to adopt this proposition. Suppose you strike out the word “white,” how long would it be before the whole State would be clothed in mourning—from the southern States to Canada, north and South. As they came in, the white man would recede; and where would be our beautiful peninsula? It would be peopled with these dark bipeds—a species not equal to ourselves. Is there any one who will say the African is of the same race as ourselves? No sir. No man on this floor. No sir; the God of Nature has stamped them so differently that they cannot amalgamate and run together. No sir. Can the African change his color, or the leopard his spots? They cannot amalgamate together without being mechanically suspended. As soon as you open the door and allow them to vote, they have a right to be voted for. They would be competent to be elected to the office of Governor or Senator. This opens the door, and you have them in your social circle. What man would like to see his daughter encircled by one of those sable gentlemen, breathing in her ear the soft accents of love? It is enough to say that we cannot admit them to political privileges without letting them into our social circle, which would, on account of the antipathies which the God of Nature has implanted between the races, be productive of nothing but misery.

The Declaration of Independence has been referred to, which declares that all men are born free and equal, &c. But sir, it refers to the white man—to the Caucasian race. Jefferson had his slaves; so had Washington. Those who claimed their independence had slaves. Do you believe that they meant that negroes should come in and vote with us? No man will believe it.

Again, sir: our constitution is based on slavery. It took seven years to frame the happy constitution under which we live. In one part of the constitution this class is considered as chattels. We all take the oath to support the constitution, from the Governor to the fence-viewer. Would it be well to take this class, considered as chattels in the constitution, and allow them to vote with us, and take them into our social circles? Would it not be a happy comment on our oath to support the constitution of the United States? It strikes me we should be in an awkward position. I am willing that those Africans should remain with us, mechanically suspended. I would educate them and exercise benevolence towards them. No man would go further to educate them. Although it looks to us and to other nations as a black spot on our natural escutcheon, I believe there is the hand of Providence in it. I believe the African has come here to be educated in this country for a great purpose. When he shall be raised to a certain state, in comparison with our own, he will go back to Liberia—to Africa—to find the source of the Nile, which has never been found by those barbarous tribes.

Mr. LEACH—Mr. Chairman: The constitution of the State of Ohio reads like our own—"every white male," &c. And what has been the practice under it? Those in whom white blood predominates, have, by their courts, been declared white men; and it is said—with how much truth I know not—that so much difficulty was experienced in determining whether white or black blood predominated, that it has lately been decided that colored persons in whose veins flowed any white blood at all, were entitled to the privileges of electors. We may expect to meet with the same difficulties here, unless the pending amendment prevails.

I am surprised, sir, at the remark of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG,] that the author of the Declaration of Independence, in asserting that "all men are born free and equal," referred only to "all white men—all men of the Caucasian race." This is, most assuredly, one of the most remarkable and profound discoveries of the present age. If the gentleman is correct, (and it would seem almost an unpardonable offence to question wisdom so profound, learning so deep, and so "miscellaneous,") if he is correct, I would very humbly suggest the propriety of so amending the article under consideration, as to have it correspond with the improved interpretation of the Declaration of Independence, and extend the right of suffrage to all men of the Caucasian race.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot pretend to follow the gentleman in all his wanderings; and in fact I am compelled to acknowledge my inability to understand all that he has said. What does the gentleman mean by "mechanical suspension" of the African race? Perhaps he meant "magnetical."

Mr. BAGG—There is repulsion, but no attraction.

Mr. LEACH—To me the argument, if not overwhelming, is incomprehensible; and by some unseen force—some principle of adhesion—whether "mechanical" or "magnetic," I cannot say, I am compelled to adhere to my original purpose, vote to strike out the word "white," and thus generously extend to every citizen of our State the inestimable privileges of a freeman.

Mr. BRITAIN said the petition was signed by several distinguished citizens of Detroit; he wished to know what the petition asks for.

The petition was read.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I understand that the citizens of the county of Wayne who signed that petition would represent that there is a class of persons in this State who are taxed, and who ought, on that ground, to have extended to them the right of suffrage.

Mr. BRITAIN—Who ever heard of a colored person being taxed in Michigan?—one who ever paid a poll tax, or whose name was enrolled in the militia, or who was called on a jury? No, sir, he is not taxed—his property has been taxed, not the man—and the tax is paid for the protection of the property, and because it costs something to protect his property.

This is a principle established in all enlightened countries. You tax persons who have no property to bear arms, to serve on juries, to work on the roads. So far you tax the poor man and the rich man alike. The tax on property is not a tax on the person, but for the defence and protection of property. On no other principle can it with justice be levied. Colored men have not been taxed, and it is not proposed to tax them.

The gentleman from Genesee [Mr. LEACH] says some objection is made to the extension of the right of suffrage to them because they are a degraded race—that they are below the white race in capability for intellectual improvement. Whether that be so or not, I leave to the Convention to decide; but every person must come to the conclusion that the colored race must be called to intellectual pursuits for a long series of years to attain that position in the intellectual world which the white race have attained, unless the original stock of the colored race is much better than that of the white race.

The gentleman from Genesee says, why make color a qualification?—why not the color of his hair, his eyes, or his nose? The simple answer is this, the word white has, when used in this Convention, acquired by common consent a technical signification. It distinguishes our own race from other races. Our own race we call white, and other races colored. There would be no advantage in adopting any other term.

Mr. Chairman, there are a few general principles connected with this subject, which ought to be examined. I know it is considered a difficult and even delicate subject to examine; but I know of no reason why it should be so considered, and am willing to come up to the standard of duty and endeavor to meet conscientiously all the responsibilities it presents.

Our sympathies are always excited for the weak. We sympathize with this class because they are said to have been cruelly brought into our country in the first place, and subjected to slavery; an outrage on their natural rights. But how is it, sir? Are they abused by being brought from the slavery of Africa to the slavery of the United States? Were not their forefathers slaves in Africa? All that read African history know that they are at the mercy of their African chiefs, both in respect to life and liberty. An African prince, on any important occasion, sends out his men, captures and brings in as many victims as he pleases, and their heads grace his festival.

Mr. Chairman, the slave of Africa is a slave to a master who recognizes no human rights except those sustained by physical power; and who, like the Deity of some of our modern worshippers, considers himself at liberty to do anything and everything "for the promotion of his own glory." Can it be possible that the condition of the slave is made worse by bringing him to the United States? The answer must be in the negative.

How are these slaves obtained. A prince wishing to make a slave speculation, makes war upon a neighboring prince, captures his men, and drives them to the coast, as your drovers drive cattle; and so entirely subject to their will do these slave drovers consider their prisoners, that on finding the coast guarded by a squadron, and no slaver there to purchase the prisoners, these drovers have butchered their prisoners as the easiest way to dispose of them, saying that they were theirs, and if the foreign authorities would not permit them to sell them they would kill them.

If that be so, it must be admitted that their condition could not be made worse. On the other hand, it certainly has been made much better.

This, then, relieves us from the reproach so often cast upon us, of robbing them of their freedom and subjecting them to slavery. Mr. Chairman, they were slaves at home; captured as slaves, driven to the coast as slaves, sold as slaves, and brought to this country as slaves; and all this by others; and the present inhabitants of the United States found themselves inheriting them as slaves. And this slavery, as already stated, is much more tolerable than that of their relatives who have been left at home to groan in African bondage.

The colored persons who ask you to extend the elective franchise to them, are descendants from this slave population, and consider themselves much better situated than their forefathers in Africa, or their brothers in Southern slavery; and in fact they may with propriety be considered the most favored portion of the African race. Having now, Mr. Chairman, as I think, relieved my fellow citizens from the unjust charge of oppression, in bringing them into this country, we may, I think, enter upon an examination of the relations existing between them and ourselves, and if possible ascertain the extent of an obligation to extend further rights and privileges to them.

Mr. Chairman, are you bound to force upon a people privileges which they do not seek, and which they are incapable of maintaining? I apprehend that a correct answer to this question will go far towards showing the relation subsisting between them and us, as well as our obligations to them.

If you are so bound, you should go and plant the standard of republicanism in that benighted country. You should go and seek out degraded and oppressed humanity, suffering the consequences of its own indiscretions and vices, and force upon them the results of discretion and virtue. Mr. Chairman what are the obligations of humanity? To proffer help to others, but not to force it upon them. If you were to separate from this Union one of the States, populate it with colored people, and give them a Republican government, how long would they maintain it? Will any gentleman say it would be as lasting as ours? The Africans of our country gathered together and furnished with the best government which men can devise, and left to themselves, would soon find themselves under a despotism. The history of the African race, even to the latest period, warrants this conclusion.

If then, they are incapable of self-government, are we bound to furnish it to them and maintain it for them? It would seem to be our duty to treat the colored population with kindness, and to cultivate them by every reasonable means in our power; but it does not seem to be any part of our duty to endanger our own institutions by extending to them privileges which they are incapable of maintaining or enjoying.

The gentleman from Genesee says there are many electors among the white men whom he would not admit to his social circle; and from that, draws the conclusion that you may as well give the right of suffrage to the colored man as to the degraded white man. But, Mr. Chairman, how often do we see the son of the degraded white man, avoiding the evil practices of his father and become an honor to himself and filling the highest stations in society. I remember now the case of an Irish boy whose father was a man of all work, and a low, dissipated man. The son went into a lawyer's office to sweep, make fires, &c., while attending school. His patron soon discovered his talents and increased his privileges. The student continued temperate and industrious—was admitted to the bar—became eminent in his profession, and connected himself by marriage with one of the most aristocratic families in his county or State. Will the gentleman from Genesee contend for a moment that the son of a colored man could have accomplished this? It is not a question which relates to individuals, but to the races. It is the stock which should be taken into consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how stands the account between the colored people and ourselves? and what are our duties to them? Why, sir, on the score of justice they have no claims upon us, because they are much better situated than their forefathers were; much better situated than their relations in Africa now are, or than these people themselves could have been, had they not been taken from there; and what is still more to the purpose, Mr. Chairman, they are not only much more refined, elevated and happy than they would have been without our interference, but they are much more refined, elevated and happy than they would be twenty years hence, if given the fairest portion of our land, and left to themselves. Is it not clear then, that the obligations of justice have already been more than satisfied; and that the only obligations now resting upon us for the extension of further privileges to them, are the obligations of benevolence and humanity?

I know, Mr. Chairman, that these obligations are firmly and deeply seated in the great American heart; but they demand nothing from us incompatible with our own well being, and the maintenance of our ability to protect these unfortunate people in the enjoyment of their present privileges, which have elevated them above the still more unfortunate portions of their race.

Mr. Chairman, you may tender to a suffering stranger the hospitality of your house, but you do not give him charge of your house, or even divide your authority with him. The master of a ship may tender to a weary traveler a passage to a foreign port, but what would be thought of that ship master who should immediately after leaving port, give up the helm to such traveler, and by that act of kindness suffer shipwreck, lose his own life and the lives of all on board under his protection, not excepting even the traveler himself?

There is an old maxim peculiarly applicable to the present case. It is this, sir: "Charity begins at home." Yes sir, even "charity should begin at home," and with this maxim I propose to see what our duties are to our colored neighbors. All the relations of society cannot subsist between them and us. Sir, you cannot take them into the more intimate relations of society. You cannot associate with them. You cannot live in the same room with them; nor can you live in a settlement, a large portion of which consists of colored people. Within a few years a settlement of several hundred has been formed in Cass county, and the inhabitants, who in the first place, under the influence of their sympathies, welcomed them with open hands, now find themselves unable to live in the same neighborhood, and are selling out their farms at half their ordinary value, in order to get out of the vicinage; and if I can judge from the anxiety depicted in their countenances when speaking of it, they consider the increase of the already flourishing settlement as one of the greatest calamities which could befall their country.

There are about four millions of colored people in the Southern States. There are also many humane persons there who would gladly emancipate their slaves, if they could conveniently find a place for them. If it be desirable to have them here, we have but to invite them by extending privileges to them, to insure an influx which will overwhelm the State.

The gentleman from Genesee said that Massachusetts and New Hampshire extended to them the elective franchise, long since; and yet their colored population did not increase; and then denies that extending to them the right of suffrage would increase their numbers amongst us. Does not that gentleman know that the regularity, economy and industry of New England, are more than the colored people can submit to? and that they would sooner submit to southern slavery than New England industry and economy? Sir, why do not these colored people go to old England, where so much sympathy has been expressed in their behalf? Because the six pence per day for laborious and incessant toil, would purchase but a small portion of even the coarse fare which the southern slave gets for his half work.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is in error. Encourage them, and they will come amongst us. They have been encouraged, and they are coming among us with a fearful rapidity. The gentleman says we extend the right of suffrage to foreigners, and invite them amongst us, and asks us if we are not as strongly bound to extend this right to colored native citizens as to white foreigners? Sir, we are not bound to extend it to either of them; if we do extend the right of suffrage to the white foreigner, we do it as a matter of policy, under the impulses of benevolence, and not as a matter of duty, under the demands of justice. Sir, the white foreigner is our father and our brother; and why should he not be invited amongst us? What have we to fear from an association with him? Why, sir, if the common theories in human philosophy are true, even a little "crossing of the breed" would not disgrace either party! Will the gentleman from Genesee admit this with regard to the colored people? Sir, those best acquainted with matters of this kind, declare that amalgamation degrades both parties; and that the offspring of this heaven forbidden union is usually burdened with a feeble frame, uncertain health, and premature death!—unerring indications of Heaven's disapprobation.

Mr. Chairman, I now wish to ask the members of this committee several questions:

1. Are we bound to injure ourselves to give to any people these privileges?
2. Can we extend these privileges without being in danger of being overwhelmed with a colored population from the south?
3. Can we be overwhelmed by a colored population from the south, without great detriment to the interests of our State?

4. Have we not a right to pursue that course of policy which the interest of the State demands, even though it be to discourage the settlement of colored people in our State? Sir, I think we have; that we do more for these people than they would do for themselves, when we protect them in the enjoyment of a free government; that the extension of the right of suffrage to them is a matter entirely optional with us; that although some of them, by their regularity and industry, give assurance that the right of suffrage might be safely entrusted to them—yet, such is the irregularity, indolence, instability, dependence, subserviency and meanness of the great body of them, as to forfeit all claims to the right of suffrage; and that the best friend of the colored man is the man who with frankness advises him to live industriously, soberly, honestly, contentedly and peaceably, under the government which has been formed and is maintained without tax upon him, or efforts of any kind from him; that although he may live peaceably and happily among us, provided he live industriously and honestly, yet so great is the difference between his race and ours, he can never expect to become one of us; and that if he wishes to participate in all the privileges of a citizen, he should go to some colony of his own people, and carry with him all the elements of self-government for which the people among whom he has been schooled are so favorably known, as well as the assurance that he and his people will have the sympathy, co-operation and assistance of the American people, who are ever so ready to assist when they can do so without too great an injury to themselves.

Mr. Chairman, there is one more question connected with this subject, about which I wish to say a few words before I take my seat. An effort was made in this hall a few days ago, in apportioning the Senators and Representatives to the several districts, to make the colored people a part of the population entitling a district to a Senator or Representative. Mr. Chairman, I thought this wrong then, and voted against it; and I think it wrong now. Why should they be so counted if they are not entitled to the elective franchise? The only correct rule appears to me to be to apportion members, as nearly as may be, according to the number of voters; and there certainly can be no justice in counting the colored people having no vote in your county, against the white people in my county, and thus permit a smaller number of votes to elect a Representative in your county than in mine; nor is it a privilege to the colored man to be thus counted; nor will it in the smallest degree advance the day of his political emancipation; but, on the other hand, it will retard it; for those persons who make themselves their political proxies, would be the last to extend to them the right of suffrage.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him how many representatives in Congress are elected on that principle?

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from St. Joseph asks me how many members of Congress are elected upon that principle. I believe twenty-one; but that has nothing to do with this case, and I am willing to give that gentleman all he can make out of that fact. It is no part of my purpose to defend the apportionment of the Southern States; and if the constitution of the United States sanctions a wrong in permitting the Southern States to make the colored people, having no votes, a part of the population entitling them to representatives in Congress, and thus requiring more northern than southern votes to elect a representative, yet I am happy to say that that same constitution may be right in rejecting aliens from that enumeration. The adoption of that constitution was the result of a compromise between the people of several States, entertaining different opinions upon this subject; but we are not thus situated, and if we adopt a wrong principle in this respect, it must be attributed to our ignorance or considered an intentional deviation from the path of rectitude.

Mr. Chairman, many arguments might be stated to maintain my position; but I will not detain the Convention in that way, and will content myself with a simple illustration, which will, I think, demonstrate to every unprejudiced mind, the injustice of the principle I am opposing.

The gentlemen from St. Joseph and Cass were both of them, if I recollect correctly, in favor of considering the colored population a part of the population enti-ting them to a representative; but one of them, at least, was not willing to give them the right of suffrage. Now let us consider these counties the residence of a few talented men, ambitious for official distinction, and looking to the colored population as an infallible means of political advancement. Let us suppose these men to be engaged in encouraging the immigration of colored people into those respective counties. As the colored population increases, the white population must decrease. The white population cannot live in the vicinity of colored settlements, and exchange neighborhood civilities with them. Those who know most about such settlements want to have the least to do with them; and I am assured that in Cass county, where a few years ago so much sympathy for the poor colored man and his oppressed family existed, as to induce the formation of a numerous colored settlement, the white people have been brought to a "realizing sense of their situation" when it is too late to retrace their steps, for the colored people have obtained a foothold, and the white people must either exchange civilities with them or sell out and leave; and that they are already selling their farms at reduced prices and leaving the county to get rid of their colored neighbors.

Mr. Chairman, this must continue to be the case. The white people cannot live with the colored people, within the same rooms, or in the same associations. And suppose these ambitious persons to continue to encourage the immigration of colored people to the counties, and the white people continue to leave until there shall be no white people left in them, except these ambitious persons; it is easy to see that these persons would be able by their own votes alone to elect themselves to office.

Will it be said that this would be an extreme case, and not likely to occur? Sir, it is already in progress, and who can set bounds to that colored settlement from which the whites are already fleeing? But the question is not whether such a circumstance may occur, but whether it would be right to give each of these counties a representative, in consequence of their colored population having no votes, and thereby enable these ambitious persons, by their own votes, to elect themselves to your Legislature?

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some of those who have so warmly advocated the claims of the colored people to a representation in the councils of the State, inform me how many colored people without votes, and one white man with a vote, should entitle a county to a representative, and said white man to the privilege of electing himself such representative by his own vote.

Mr. Charman, if this would be wrong, in the extent to which I have carried it, it would be wrong in any degree, however small, and should not receive the sanction of this Convention.

Mr. Chairman, there are several other questions relative to the civil and political rights of these unfortunate colored people, which I should be happy to examine, but I have already trespassed too long upon the patience of the Convention.

The question was taken on Mr. ORR's amendment to strike out the word "white," and lost.

Mr. RAYNALE offered the following as a substitute for section one:

"In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of 21 years, having resided in this State six months next preceding an election, shall be entitled to vote at such election: and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, having resided in this State two years in all, and having filed his intentions to become a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to vote at all elections; provided such inhabitant shall have resided in this State for the six months next preceding such election; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote, except in the township or ward of which he is an actual resident."

Which was not adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike out "or while a student of any seminary of learning," in section 5; which did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the words "Constitution or," were inserted at the end of first line of section six.

On motion of Mr. GALE, the words "non compos mentis," in fourth line of section six, were stricken out, and "not of sound mind," inserted.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, section 8 was stricken out.

The resolution referring the question of extension of the right of suffrage to colored male citizens, to the people at the next general election for their adoption or rejection, was read.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out all after the word "resolved."

Mr. WOODMAN hoped it would not be struck out.

Mr. BAGG hoped it would be struck out. Three-fourths of the people would vote against striking out the word "white," in any law, but it would cause excitement.

Mr. BUSH hoped it would not be struck out. There are many respectable citizens who are anxious to have this question submitted to the people. He believed four-fifths of the people would vote against the proposition; but he wished it to be submitted—it would stop agitation afterwards.

Mr. KINGSLEY said it had been agitated in the Legislature every year for several years past. Submit the question to the people now, and it will stop this agitation.

On motion of Mr. LEACH, the blank was filled with "1st January, 1851."

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the resolution would be adopted. The committee had a large number of petitions before them, signed by some three thousand persons. A large class wish to vote on this question, and it is right that they should have the privilege.

The motion of Mr. RAYNALE to strike out did not prevail.

Mr. CHAPEL moved to strike out of section 6, the words "or who shall make or become directly or indirectly interested in any bet or wager, pending upon the result of any election in this State," and insert "and for depriving any person who shall make or become directly or indirectly interested in any bet or wager depending upon the result of any election, from the right to vote at such election."

Mr. C. said he made the motion because betting was associated in the section with infamous crimes. Betting was fashionable in Presidential elections, and many persons have made money by it. I think (said Mr. C.) it is right to shut us up constitutionally. It may do good, but I do not think that a person making a fashionable bet should be classed with those convicted of infamous crimes.

Mr. CHURCH—Did not the gentleman vote in favor of placing fashionable dueling in the same position?

Mr. CHAPEL—I think not. I always voted for a code of honor.

Mr. GOODWIN remarked that the section only provided that the Legislature might act upon it. It was a power that ought to be retained by the Legislature.

Mr. BUSH said many honorable men made bets on the result of elections. Would gentlemen say, or would they leave it to the Legislature to say, that a man, for a bet, when it is fashionable, or that citizens making a trifling bet, should be proscribed forever? A warm party man might be led into it for the purpose of excluding him from voting.

Mr. N. PIERCE had known females reduced to distress from betting, and it was desirable that they should be protected. This leaves it open to the Legislature; if the people do not want it the Legislature will not pass it.

Mr. CRARY believed it would not apply to the Presidential election, upon the result of which it was most usual to bet. He moved to amend.

Mr. GOODWIN believed it would extend to all elections in this State, although the election may be for President of the United States; though he had no objection to having it made more explicit.

Mr. ROBERTSON saw no object in cutting off a person on account of his making a bet on the result of an election in other States. The object he supposed was to cut off inducements to use corrupt means to affect an election, which a person making a heavy bet might be induced to do. It would be wrong to disfranchise a man because he had bet a new hat on an election.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. RAYNALE moved to strike out all after the word "State."

Mr. R. said all punishment should be such as to have its effect on the community, and should be complete in itself. It seemed to him to be illiberal and unjust, after a man had suffered what the law required, that he should remain forever a proscribed man.

Mr. HASCALL saw no impropriety in excluding those persons from participating in the government who had set themselves against all government. It shows they are not disposed to be well behaved or good citizens. On the ground that they had set themselves up in rebellion against the laws of the government, they should have nothing to do in making the laws.

Mr. WALKER believed the object of punishment to be the reformation of crime. If it does produce that effect, we ought not to place odium upon him after he has had the wholesome lesson of instruction imparted to him. It might drive him back to the commission of crime.

Mr. WITHERELL said there were two reasons for inflicting punishment—warning to the community and reformation of the offender. Many cases occurred, where the Governor exercised the pardoning power on persons supposed to be innocent; and there were cases where persons had undergone the whole term of punishment, who were by many supposed to be innocent; in such cases it would be a double hardship if excluded from the right of suffrage on account of the conviction.

Mr. CRARY—After a man is convicted, he is sentenced to punishment as an example to others, and to reform the individual; yet you propose to fix a mark upon him, like that of Cain, which shall follow him through life, though you may have reformed him. If a man who has committed crime shall have been confined so long as to deter others and reform himself, you should not fix a stigma upon him. The probability is that he will not reform, if the people are constantly pointing at the black mark upon him.

Mr. BACKUS said he saw none of the difficulties which gentlemen seemed to apprehend. This provision leaves it in the hands of the Legislature to make provision that persons guilty of infamous crimes, bribery, perjury, and crimes of that class, shall be deprived of the elective franchise. Why should they not? Is a man who has been steeped in crime, and who has just come out of the State prison, a fit person to participate with us at the ballot box, to make our judges and our constituted State authorities? I think not. If a man has been guilty of the crime of bribery or perjury, his ballot should not mingle with ours in perpetuating our institutions.

On motion of Mr. BUSH, section six was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the following was substituted for said section:

“Laws may be passed excluding from the right of suffrage, and from holding any office under the laws of this State, persons who may be convicted of an infamous crime, are non compos mentis or insane.”

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL the committee rose, reported the article back to the Convention with amendments, asked their concurrence therein, and to be discharged from the further consideration of said article.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the Article entitled “Elections,” with sundry amendments, in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the article; and the same was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. J. BARTOW, the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, (23d day,) June 28.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev Mr. SANFORD.

REPORTS.

Mr. RIX ROBINSON, from the committee on County Officers and County Government, reported the following article, which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to committee of the whole and ordered printed.

ARTICLE —.

County Officers and County Government.

1. Each county duly organized by law, shall be a body corporate and politic, with such rights, duties, powers, privileges and immunities as shall be established by law. All suits and proceedings, by or against any county, shall be in the name thereof.

2. No county now organized by law, shall ever be reduced by the organization of new counties, to less than six hundred square miles.

3. In each organized county there shall be one sheriff, a county clerk, who shall be the clerk of all the courts of record to be held in the county, a county treasurer, who shall be ex-officio register of deeds, one county surveyor, a prosecuting attorney, and one or more coroners, chosen by the qualified electors thereof, once in two years, and as often as vacancies shall happen, and whose duties and powers shall be prescribed by law.

4. The county clerk, county treasurer, judge of probate and prosecuting attorney, shall hold their offices at the county seat.

5. The sheriff shall hold no other office, and shall be incapable of holding the office of sheriff longer than four in any term of six years. He may be required by law to renew his security from time to time, and in default of giving such security, his office shall be deemed vacant; but the county shall never be made responsible for his acts.

6. A board of supervisors, consisting of one to be chosen from each organized township, shall be established in each county, with such powers, to be uniform throughout the State, as is hereinafter prescribed.

7. All incorporated cities shall have such representation in the board of supervisors of the counties in which they are situated, as the Legislature may direct.

8. The board of supervisors shall have power to organize new townships, and may grant privileges to construct bridges or mill dams, or to lay out roads in their respective counties; but no township shall be organized of less dimensions than the United States survey thereof.

9. No county seat, when once established, shall be removed, until the place to which it is proposed to be removed shall be designated by a majority of the board of supervisors of said county, and two-thirds of the qualified electors shall have voted in favor of the proposed location, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

10. The board of supervisors of any county may borrow or raise by tax, ——— dollars, for constructing or repairing public buildings, highways or bridges; but no greater sum shall be borrowed or raised by tax for such purpose, in any one year, unless authorized by the vote of a majority of the electors of said county.

11. The board of supervisors shall fix and define the compensation of the various county officers in their respective counties; and the sum so fixed and defined, shall be subject to no alteration by appeal or otherwise.

12. The Legislature may hereafter confer upon the board of supervisors of the several counties of this State, such further powers of local legislation and administration as they may deem proper.

Mr. REDFIELD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourn, it shall stand adjourned until Monday, the eighth of July, and that during the said adjournment, the pay of members and officers shall be suspended.

Mr. BAGG offered the following substitute:

Resolved, That the remaining members, and the officers of this Convention have leave of absence till July 6th, to take place from and after the 29th instant.

Mr. B. said that he offered the substitute in good faith. He had voted constantly against an adjournment, and had remained in his place while others had gone home—some, he believed, two or three times. It now appeared that all were desirous of going home, and it would be found impossible to proceed with the business. When he came here, he supposed that six weeks would have been sufficient time to have accomplished their business. Four weeks had nearly been spent, and he did not see but it would require six weeks longer to get through, if there was to be this vacation of seats and this discussion of adjournment. We have been growing "small by degrees and beautifully less," and soon should be without a quorum. It was but to adjourn for the time contemplated in his resolution.

Mr. REDFIELD had voted invariably against an adjournment, until it was evident that a suspension of business was to take place. He thought it was but justice, if the members saw fit to adjourn, that they should not receive their per diem pay while absent from their duty.

Mr. HANSCOM opposed both the resolutions, and any action on the subject. The journals of the Convention would show a vacillation on this question that would make us appear ridiculous. When we were reduced to less than a quorum, if such should be the result, we could adjourn from day to day until members had returned. He had voted against his own judgment for an adjournment, for the accommodation of members who had now gone home, and the inducement for him to thus vote was taken away.

Mr. STOREY moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which was carried—yeas 38—nays 24.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH asked leave of absence for Mr. WHITEMORE till the 8th of July.

Mr. S. CLARK said that it was evident that it was the intention of members to go home and still draw their pay. He should oppose all such efforts, for he did not believe it right for members to abandon their duties and still receive the same compensation as if they were at their posts. If members desired to be absent, they should be so at their own expense, and not at the expense of the State. He should therefore vote against the granting of leave of absence to the member desiring it, and against any such privilege to any member, unless called by the sickness of himself or family from his duty. He was willing to stay here and attend to the duties of this body until they were completed; and if other members felt differently on the subject than he did, and were disposed to go home, he thought it no more than justice to prevent their receiving pay during their absence.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH did not understand that his colleague had gone home from sickness, but he had urgent business which called his attention; and after the many grants of this kind of favors, he should be extremely sorry to see his colleague refused the same privilege. He (Mr. Van V.) had, when the subject was first acted upon, voted invariably against paying members during the adjournment that had been so much talked of; but as that object could not be obtained, and after so much courtesy had been extended to members, he could not conceive it right to make exceptions now, and under present circumstances objections came with a very bad grace from those who had been home and returned under such leave.

Mr. CRARY said that he thought every man in the Convention stood upon his own honor in relation to his absence. He had opposed an adjournment, because he had been confident that the Convention would complete its labors by the middle of July; and members would see, on looking at what was behind in their business, if all the attention of the Convention had been directed to their duties, that it was not possible to continue the session longer than that time. The members who desired to go home should have voted themselves no pay, and left those unmolested who remained at their posts. If the Convention adjourned, a number of members could not go home within the time limited; and it would be a great injustice to force the minority to remain here at their own expense.

Mr. BRITAIN submitted the following:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 10th day of July next, and that no compensation be allowed the members and officers of this Convention during said adjournment.

Mr. HANSCOM suggested that the resolution was identical, in substance, with the one which had just been postponed, and therefore not in order.

Mr. BRITAIN—Under the time fixed by this resolution, members could leave their homes on Monday, and all be ready to take their seats on Wednesday morning. He had two objects in this resolution. The first was to allow such members as desired to go home to do so; and the second object was to save to the State from four to five thousand dollars. He [Mr. B.] could not go home, but had been ready to vote for an adjournment merely for the accommodation of members, whenever they were willing to do so without pay. He thought it wrong to draw pay for services that were not rendered; and he was willing to remain here on his own expense during the proposed adjournment.

Mr. GALE said there had been nearly as much time spent in discussing this matter as it was proposed to be absent. It appeared to him that injustice would be done by the resolution, for many members had been home once or twice, and members who remained here during the adjournment would be at expense.

Mr. WOODMAN moved the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

Mr. W. wished to see the matter disposed of. He was not in favor of voting to members of professions, who were off on their own business, and making money thereby, their per diem allowance here. Those who stay here should draw their pay; and those who go, should not, during their absence.

Mr. ROBERTS desired simply to say for the members of the Upper Peninsula, that they had voted for an adjournment merely for the accommodation of members.

Mr. N. PIERCE would ask of the gentleman if he could not so modify his resolution as to substitute the 15th of August instead of the 10th of July? It would accommodate the farming portion of the Convention very much better, as by that time they could nearly complete their harvesting.

Mr. BRITAIN said he could not do it, for two reasons. It would bring the remaining part of the session in the most sickly season of the year; and it would bring out the constitution too late for a full canvass of its merits before the fall election.

Mr. STOREY moved that the Convention go into committee of the whole on the general order.

The question was carried by yeas 37, nays 25.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair.

Mr. WALKER moved that the committee rise.

Which motion was lost.

The committee took up the article "State Officers."

The question being on the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, made on the 24th inst., to strike out of the 1st section "who shall be ex officio," and insert "a,"

Mr. ROBERTSON said that there had been certain information called for by the Convention, which was needed in a proper investigation of the subject under consideration. That information has been given and ordered printed, but it had not yet been laid on the tables. It might be proper, therefore, to pass over this article.

Mr. GOODWIN—There is another matter of information which the Convention has taken steps to procure, which might be useful in the disposition of this section. A committee has been appointed to report to this Convention the relative quantity of land received from the general government by this State, as compared with the other north-western States, which report has not yet been made.

Mr. J. BARTOW—The information alluded to would be useful; but the simple question as to whether the Commissioner of the Land Office should be retained in the new Constitution, as the head of a distinct department, he thought could be decided with the information that it was presumed every member was fully acquainted. All knew the amount of public lands which we had received from the general government, and for what purposes they were given. The disposition that had been made of them also, was generally understood, and it was not necessary at this time to go into all the details. A very large proportion of the lands had been disposed of, and thus a large share of the duties of such an officer were removed. The remainder would soon be sold. The duties at no time during the existence of the office, had claimed all the time of the Commissioner, and a decrease of the amount of land would be followed by a decrease of the duties of the office. The duties were easy and simple, and could be readily performed by a clerk. If the whole amount of land which the State has received, were at this time placed in the hands of the State, it might be necessary to retain such an officer for a time; but the present position of our lands did not, and could not require the creation or retention of this officer in the Constitution. The whole business could be as well under the superintendence of the State Treasurer, where the report of the committee had placed it, as to have a separate head. Through the hands of the Treasurer all of the money had to pass, and the other duties connected with our lands were not onerous enough to justify the expense, or demand the attention of another officer. He would give way for the reading of the communication from the Commissioner of the Land Office.

Mr. REDFIELD said the last gentleman had submitted all that was necessary to be said. The office could be abolished without any injury to the interests of the State, and be a saving of a very considerable expense. The expense resulting from the provision as reported by the committee, could not exceed forty dollars; whereas, under the system as heretofore existing, it had cost fourteen hundred dollars. It was simply for this Convention to say whether the State would have this department of her business transacted equally well for forty dollars, or whether it would gratuitously bestow the difference of the calculation upon the head of a separate department. There existed no necessity for the office, and he had no doubt that, under the superintendence of the Treasurer, its duties would be as faithfully performed and as acceptable to the people, as under the system proposed by the pending amendment.

Mr. CHAPEL offered a substitute for the section, providing that the Commissioner of the Land Office should be ex-officio Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Mr. BUSH hoped that the pending amendment [Mr. ROBERTSON'S] would prevail. It was providing for the proper management of the largest interest of the State—an interest that was increasing, instead of diminishing, as had been asserted on this floor. The policy of the State had intended it to be an increasing interest. The lands were sold, and twenty-five per cent paid down, and the land remained security for the balance; which amount was paying its annual interest. Thus a new account was opened at every sale, which of course increased the amount of business in the department. Such was the policy of the State; that the largest share of the amount should be at interest, and secured by the land sold. It was the best policy that it should be so managed. There could be no better security. And thus every acre sold would add to the business of the department; and for a great number of years would this increase go on, till all our lands were disposed of.

What disposition should be made then of this interest? Under whose management should it be placed? It would be better, in his opinion, to place it under the control of a person directly responsible to the people for the proper performance of his trust, and elected with special reference to his fitness for this position, rather than leave it an incident to another department. To accomplish such a purpose he was willing to suffer a trifling expense further—of expending a few more dollars for a public officer than leave it in the hands of a clerk in another department.

Mr. REDFIELD—The proposed expense would be forty dollars, while that now incurred is something like fourteen hundred.

Mr. BUSH—If it can be shown that forty dollars would pay for what now costs fourteen hundred, he should be in favor of it; but if the same amount, or near the same amount, was to be paid to clerks in another department to perform these duties, he was opposed to it. But he was not convinced that this sum could provide for a proper management of this interest of the State. It now required the attention of the Commissioner and two clerks, and he could not see how it would require less attention under the management of another department. The State Treasurer would be obliged to have so many more clerks. He was afraid that the experiment might prove too much like some other calculations of reform in this State. He had heard it trumpeted that our laws could be codified for five hundred dollars, and he had seen it roll up to ten thousand.

Our lands were too often considered as public plunder. The timber, or anything else that was found, which was valuable, was taken without hesitation, and with impunity. Was it not necessary to have some officer to see to this, who would feel a responsibility, whose scrutiny would be feared, and whose energy would prevent such depredations?

But it had been urged that the commissioner had little or nothing to do, and that he was away from his post of duty a considerable part of his time. Such had been the fact, to a greater or less extent with all the State officers. The Superintendent of Public Instruction, Auditor General, except the present incumbent, and all others, had been from their places at certain seasons of the year. The State Treasurer had been absent to New Jersey for a long time, and his duties had been performed by a deputy. It was sometimes necessary for the Auditor General and Treasurer both to be absent from their offices on business imposed upon them by law. So it was with the Commissioner of the Land Office. His duties called him to different parts of the State. It was true that at some portions of the year, the duties of this office were light—that they did not require as much attention as at other seasons. But that did not remove the necessity of providing that when those duties were demanded, a faithful and competent officer should be in readiness to do them.

Another point worthy of consideration in this recommendation of the committee, was the placing of the appointing power, which should more properly be in the hands of the people, in the hands of heads of departments. The direct responsibility to the people is therefore, in a great measure removed, and the evils resulting from this power, and of which so much complaint had justly been made, would be increased. An officer elected by the people, and responsible to the State, to have the direct charge of this important branch of our State government, was, as he thought, best calculated to promote the interest of the people and the faithful discharge of the trust.

Mr. REDFIELD said that the necessary clerk hire would be the same, whether the management of this matter was in the hands of a Commissioner or the Treasurer. But the attention of a Commissioner might be dispensed with entirely, without loss to the interest of this branch of our State affairs. In some branches connected with this office, as had been asserted, the business was increasing, but in others it was being closed. The 500,000 acres of internal improvement land had been nearly sold, and nearly closed up.

In regard to the late incumbent, he had understood that he was absent half of his time, and that for the last six months of his term he was not at his post at all.

Mr. CHURCH asked if the late incumbent did not urge upon the last Legislature the impropriety of abolishing that office?

Mr. REDFIELD said he believed he did not. The recommendation to restore the office was made by another officer.

Mr. ROBERTSON—How long was the office attached to the Auditor's office, by the act of the Legislature of 1849?

Mr. REDFIELD—Three months.

Mr. ROBERTSON said that the difference of expense under the two propositions could be but trifling. The salary of a chief clerk to oversee this department, were it placed under the Treasurer's charge, could not be less than eight hundred dollars; and the salary of a Commissioner elected by the people could not much exceed that amount. The salaries of clerks would be the same in either case.

During the three months the business of this department was under the superintendence of the Auditor General, with the same number of clerks as before employed, the business had so fallen behind, that after the office of Commissioner was restored and the present incumbent entered upon his duties, extra clerks had to be employed, and had been employed up to the present time. This was no fault of the Auditor General, for the duties belonging legitimately to his office required all of his attention. But the business of the office would not have thus suffered if a head of this department had been directly responsible for the performance of this particular duty.

The most important duty of this department was undoubtedly the charge of the primary school fund. Connected with it were the dearest interests of the State—her educational prosperity, and the consequent development of those good qualities which make us worthy of being a great State in an empire of freemen. There was a large amount of land belonging to this fund yet unsold, and accounts therewith yet to be opened. It was never anticipated that the principal of this fund was to be used or diminished, or even suffered to stand still. It was expected to be kept at interest; and it would keep increasing with new sales, till it would become of such importance as to make the Commissioner the most important office of the government. Twenty years would not elapse before this would be the case. And if this was to be the result, it was of importance that this interest should be guarded by men more responsible than mere clerks in a department. There could not exist the proper relation between any department and this fund, to secure to it that attention which its importance demands. It would be of secondary consideration to any department to which it might be attached. No one could dispute its consequence—no one could gainsay its claims to the closest attention. Why, then, impose this duty upon an officer elected for the purpose of discharging the functions of another branch of the government?

Another important consideration that urged upon his mind the importance of providing for an officer for this department of our State affairs, was the fact that there was a large quantity of land yet unsold,

A proper and safe disposal of these lands would require a man of much experience, and who would feel the responsibility of the duty. Much of these lands were valuable mainly for their timber; and the proper guards to prevent the State from being swindled should be provided for in their sale. The officer holding them for sale should know their value, and should be a man of sufficient judgment to look well to the interests of the State. The State Treasurer, to be sure, might possess these qualifications, but his main duties would be those connected with the Treasury, and he would be elected with reference to his qualifications for that position, and not for his supposed knowledge of our landed interests, or his qualifications to properly conduct its affairs. It seemed to him, therefore, that with these considerations before the committee, they would see the importance to the best interests of the State, that the office of Commissioner of the Land Office should be placed in the constitution. The accounts that must be opened—the consequent increase of the business—

Mr. REDFIELD—The gentleman must recollect that a large number of accounts are being closed, and a consequent diminution of business must follow.

Mr. ROBERTSON would venture to predict that if it required at this time two active men to perform the duties of this office, in ten years it would require four. This increase of business, and the necessity of a strict oversight of this interest, and a responsibility felt to the people, would justify and demand a distinct department for this branch of our State affairs.

Mr. N. PIERCE was very anxious to protect the school fund. The great burden of our school system rested upon it; and he desired to see it increased as far as possible. But which system proposed would be the best, he might not clearly see. He had felt a disposition when he came here to reduce as far as possible the number of the public officers, and more particularly since he had found the Convention sometimes inclined to go with him. He felt it an object, so far as it could be done safely, to impose all the duties upon a public officer that he could perform. But if this school fund could not be properly cared for under the arrangement proposed by the committee, then some other mode could be devised, and the Convention in its wisdom would do as it pleased. But if this Commissioner was but a mere cypher, and that when he stood alone he meant nothing, and only added to the expense as he stood in relation to others—drawing a thousand dollars salary, and returning no service, he was in favor of cutting off his head. He had thought the State could do without several of its present officers. The Lieutenant Governor, as well as others, he thought might just as well be dispensed with as not. He was in favor of making every officer do some duty. The State had no business to employ men to do nothing. But he was satisfied that this Commissioner had not heretofore done much business.

Mr. CHAPEL—How did the gentleman obtain his information?

Mr. N. PIERCE had not traveled out of his way to get any information, but from the general impression—from conversation with those who ought to know, and from his own observation, he was satisfied the Commissioner himself had done but very little business. He had usually been absent traveling for his own pleasure. If this was the custom of that officer, the Convention could just as well as not relieve him of those duties. He had supposed that any officer would protect this fund who should be entrusted with it; that is, if clerks always did the business, one officer could do it as well as another. The State Treasurer could say go and do it, as well as to retain another officer to say the same thing. He never hired men to tell others what to do; neither ought the State to do so.

If the Legislature had not provided too much business for the Treasury department, and he thought they had not,—and certainly the duties could not be very burdensome under the constitution we were preparing,—and if the fund would not suffer under such management, and the one thousand dollars salary could be thus saved to be added yearly to the amount of the fund, it would seem best to him to do away with that office. But it was said other States had a Commissioner. Very true. Connecticut had one. But his duty was to travel to see to the interests of his department. Through his own State, and New York and Ohio, he was called to attend to the lands and securities belonging to his department. He was not at the capitol at his ease, nor away at his pleasure. His duties were active ones, and as such were of value to his department and to the State. How our business had been transacted he was not fully aware; neither should he urge his curiosity beyond a proper course to find out. Let that be as it would, he believed the Convention felt disposed to do right in this matter, and after a full canvass of the whole subject, fix it about as it should be.

Mr. KINGSLEY said that he was in favor of abolishing one or the other of these offices. The argument of the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH,] that he wished an officer directly responsible to the people, to have charge of this interest of the State, seemed of little or no force. The Treasurer was to be elected by the people; and would they be less likely to get a responsible man to fill that position if the further duties of commissioner were imposed upon him? And would he not be as directly responsible to the people for the faithful discharge of the Commissioner's duties as if he had been elected for those particular duties alone?

The assertion that the Commissioner had a great deal of business to do could not be sustained; and certainly, for the future, his duties could not be increased. The assertion that the Commissioner had the charge of the lands before they were sold would be found not to be so. The prosecuting attorneys of the respective counties were required to exercise this charge. At least, this duty was imposed upon them, and no other officer has ever assumed such duties. If a person wished a lot of the school land, he made his application therefor; and after the land was sold and the twenty-five per cent. paid, that was about the extent of the Commissioner's duties.

Mr. CRARY—Bonds are frequently taken in cases where the twenty-five per cent. is not sufficient to protect the interest of the fund.

Mr. KINGSLEY—That is not a very tedious duty. The interest on the remainder had to be paid annually, and the money passed into the Treasurer's hand. There could be no necessity for an intermediate officer. The committee had undoubtedly investigated all the facts which might have a bearing upon this question, and had made their report; and he felt disposed to rely upon their judgment, and to sustain their conclusions.

The office was unnecessary—the officer was absent from his post a large share of his time—the duties were done by clerks. What reason then for his retention? The Legislature would never dispense with this office; and this was the place, and now was the time, to reform these abuses which had grown on our State government.

Mr. CRARY said that he did not feel disposed to continue this debate, but he had a word to say of what had passed under his personal observation. He had known something of the workings of this department of State government, and had taken something of interest in its affairs. He had known the Commissioner of the Land Office, and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, and had had an opportunity to judge of the extent of their duties. During the time the office was located at Marshall, a period of four years, he had occasion very frequently to observe the transactions in the office—of the amount of business which was done, the number employed, and the time devoted to their duties during that period, he had had some opportunities of judging. Three persons' whole attention was usually necessary to perform the duties of the office; and he had not unfrequently seen them engaged in their business at unreasonable hours, after the ordinary business of the day had been closed.

Our educational interest was one of the most important branches of the government. The interests in the charge of the Commissioner, or whoever discharges his duties, and in the charge of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, were of the greatest moment to the whole people; and whatever means could be devised to guard these interests, it behooves this Convention to provide.

That the duties that followed a proper charge of our State lands were sufficient to warrant a distinct department of the State government, he could not doubt. The accounts were not only increasing with every new sale, but a per cent. was being paid on the principal remaining due at the time of the sale. People were paying for these lands; and, for the future, those who have purchased school lands would be paying more rapidly than heretofore. It followed as a natural consequence of persons getting their lands cleared off, and their farms improved and productive, that they wished to get out of debt. What was to be done with this principal of the school fund? It was not to be used up—that was settled. It should not remain idle, as in that condition it would be useless. Were we disposed to let the State run in debt to this fund? It was a bad policy. Connecticut had set us an example which it might be wise to follow. She had loaned out her fund on bond and mortgage, and kept doing so as fast as it accumulated, through the hands of an efficient commissioner. We should have to do the same, unless the State was to have the use and control of this fund. Between the landed security of the people of the State and the obligations of the government, there would be no reason for choice. The State was subject to the thousand commotions that effect her credit, to convulsions that might exhaust her resources; and, in case of a revolution, not a dollar of the fund would ever be saved. As a mere question of policy, this State should not have the use of this fund—to become in debt as a State to this fund. It was wrong, and should not be entertained for a moment.

It had been said here that the Commissioner had paid very little personal attention to the duties of his office. But he had supposed that it came from those who were not fully acquainted with this office. At least he [Mr. C.] did not believe this to be the case. There might be seasons of the year when the business of the office was not as great as others, and the officer could be away. This was the case with all offices, and no more with this office than any other. It was a question of some importance for this Convention to decide, whether this department shall be administered as secondary to another, or whether we should provide for an officer for the special purpose of superintending its duties, and to be directly responsible for those duties, and for no other. For him, he should vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. ROBERTSON.]

Mr. BACKUS said that when this subject first attracted his attention, he was in favor of combining the two offices. He had been disposed, so far as they could with safety, to diminish the number of the public officers; and with this view he had entertained the opinion that the office of Commissioner could be dispensed with. His first impressions, however, had given away, and he should be opposed to the removal of that officer.

The abolition of this office would produce a change in our State policy—the policy of our legislation in reference to our State lands; and every change must be disastrous to the public interests in that department. Such is the inevitable result of a change, and its effects were worthy of consideration in the settlement of this question.

If the necessities of the government did not require the abolition of this office, and the best interest of the school fund required such an officer, it was best to make the State land interest a separate department of the government. The teachings of the past and the prospects for the future, seemed clearly to indicate that this was to be far the more important of the two offices proposed to be combined, if not the most important of any of the departments of the State. The office, he judged, had heretofore been badly managed; more, perhaps, from the inefficient laws under which he acted, than any negligence of the officer; but the duties legitimately belonging to this department, and properly placed to the duty of an officer, were of sufficient magnitude to be confined to the responsibility of a distinct officer.

Mr. CHURCH said that reference had been made to information derived from officers of State. How was this information obtained? The Convention certainly had not made any requests for such information as had been alluded to. Individual members then had called upon the officers; but was that the proper mode? It seemed to him to be compromising the dignity of the members to obtain their information in that manner. And if any officer chose to pour into the ears of members their complaints or wishes, it might be well to know it.

Mr. N. PIERCE—State officers have not poured into my ears their complaints or wishes, sir; neither have they acted beyond their proper sphere; neither do I believe members have compromised their dignity by improperly seeking for information.

Mr. CHAPEL said he found fault with the arrangement of this report. He wished to see a consistency between the classification of the duties of an office and the officer. If the idea of saving expense to the State called for the combination of the offices of Treasurer and Commissioner, the same reasoning would call for the combination of the offices of Secretary of State and Superintendent of Public Instruction. We had resolved upon biennial sessions of the legislature, and the Secretary of State's duties would thus be diminished one-half, and that of the Treasurer to a very considerable degree. Now, if these combinations were to take place, he wanted to see the most important branch in the department placed first in the combination. He wished to retain the principal officer, and make him ex-officio of the other. This was the reason he had offered his amendment.

Under this constitution the duties of the Treasurer would be very light; any one, even a boy, could attend to them. The Commissioner's duties were not to be affected by the reforms of this Convention, but from necessity were greatly to augment. He did not think it very proper to provide a clerk for the most important duties, and leave the minor ones to the charge of the responsible officer. If it was necessary to bring either head to the block, take the one of the least consequence.

As to the wholesale shots that had been made at the duties of the land office, he presumed they had been made without a proper knowledge or comprehension of their extent. If they had not been performed by the principal, they had been done by competent deputies. After the office had been once abolished, the Legislature last winter thought best to restore it. Its duties had fallen behind, and the Legislature saw the necessity of restoring the office. Of the particular manner in which the late incumbent performed his duties, he was not aware; nor was it to any purpose in this discussion. The proper corrective to negligence in office was to be applied—for they were all to receive their places directly from the people, and therefore would feel their responsibility.

Mr. BUSH said that many remarks had been made, and much fault found with the late Commissioner of the Land Office. He wished to say a word to correct any erroneous impression that may have been entertained of that officer. He was a man above reproach. If there was a man in the State government who had discharged his duties faithfully, either to the spirit or the letter of the law, it was that man. That there were times when there was little business in the department, was true; and that this officer may have been absent during those periods. But he had never, he (Mr. B.) would venture to say, been absent when his duties demanded his attention.

Mr. ORR said that he was a member of the committee who had reported this article. While the committee was acting on this section, he was not satisfied that the provision reported was the best; yet he had yielded to the superior knowledge of the chairman. He was almost entirely unadvised as to the duties of this department, and therefore had relied upon the judgment of those whose positions heretofore had given them a better opportunity of knowing. Yet, from the information communicated from the department, and from the bearings of this discussion, he was satisfied that the department of the land office should be retained as a separate office of the State, and that the officer should be elected by the people.

He could not agree with the proposition of the gentleman from Macomb, [Mr. CHAPEL.] The Superintendent of Public Instruction should also be a separate officer, and he should receive a salary sufficient to secure the best talent in the State.

On motion of Mr. HATHAWAY, the committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

The Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

After laying on the table a motion granting leave of absence to Mr. CONNER for an indefinite period, and pending the question to lay on the table a similar motion granting leave of absence to Mr. HASCALL,

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. MORRISON in the chair.

Article —, "State Officers," being under consideration, and the question being on the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON to strike out "who shall be ex-officio," and insert "a,"

Mr. S. CLARK said he had listened to the discussion drawn out by this motion with very much interest. He hoped the motion would not prevail. If he was to judge from the remarks which had been made, and from the communication from the present Commissioner, he should think the office could be very well abolished. It would seem from the communication of the Commissioner, that there had been less than five thousand sales since this department had been established. From 1836 up to this time, all the sales of the lands belonging to the several funds amounted to just four thousand one hundred and fifty-nine. There follows, then, that the same number of accounts only have been opened. Deducting the number which may have been closed, and you will have the amount of the actual duties of the office. Add to this the correspondence incident to these accounts, and you have the total business of the department. Count them all, and they are no more than the fair labor of a single officer; and the duties are of such a character that they would be as well performed by a clerk as by a head of a separate department. The salary of that officer is thus virtually given away. What shall we do? Shall we not save that amount? It would be so much saved yearly to the State.

The argument that it was an important office was one that could be used on all occasions and in relation to every office. That the duties were important, was not a sufficient argument to retain a separate officer to perform them; and unless there was a necessity shown—the fact that the duties of the station were sufficient to be placed to the responsibilities of one man, and that the other officers were entrusted with all that should be placed to their responsibility—unless such a necessity was shown, he could see no reason for the proposed retention of the Commissioner.

Some members had suggested the abolition of some of the other offices. They too were all important. They were the usual machinery of all States, and therefore classified to suit our ideas of a government. The committee had had all these questions under consideration, and had recommended the abolition of this office. He felt disposed to stand by the report of the committee. The experience of the chairman of that committee, in our own affairs, made him qualified to judge what offices were necessary, and on the fullest conviction that this office might be dispensed with, the report was made. A thousand dollars saved yearly to our school fund was a great consideration; particularly when the disposition of it, as now proposed, would return no equivalent to the State. It seemed to him that one efficient clerk, under the superintendence of the Treasurer, was all that should be, or would be required for the proper and faithful administration of our State land interest.

Mr. HANSCOM was willing to give great weight to the report of a committee, in all cases; but when a report was made by any one, of however much experience, while others could judge, he felt bound to follow his own convictions against that report. He had been convinced that the duties legitimately belonging to this department, were sufficient to warrant the retention of the Commissioner, and he should therefore vote for the amendment.

The duties, it was admitted on all hands, would require clerical attention. The difference between the salary of a responsible officer and an irresponsible clerk was of too small account to weigh against the consideration of a better management of its affairs. The affairs of this department were to affect us through all coming time; and the extra per annum allowance could not be better appropriated than in thus providing for the best administration of this office, even if that extra allowance should reach one thousand dollars. The amount could not be better spent. The intelligence of the people rested on their education; and their education in a great degree rested upon the school fund. The education of every man, woman and child, was one of the great objects of the State—one of the greatest purposes of our government. If we wish to subserve that cause, every effort to give it consideration and prominence in the minds of the people and the affairs of the State—to secure its best and most efficient management—should be resorted to. That this great cause of education would be furthered by placing the State lands in charge of a distinct department, there could be no doubt. The experience of other States had demonstrated that fact.

There was another objection to this attaching the duties of the Land Commissioner to the State Treasurer's office. It was a virtual extension of the appointing power. The person to be entrusted with the management of this important department was to receive his commission from the head of another department. If the argument was good against the appointing power in any case, it most certainly held good in this. It had become the settled policy of the people to elect their own officers to all responsible trusts, and there was no occasion for making an exception in this case.

The motion of Mr. ROBERTSON then prevailed.

Mr. CROUSE moved to strike out "Superintendent of Public Instruction," in 1st line, and insert after "years," in 4th line, "and a Superintendent of Public Instruction, who shall hold his office for four years."

Mr. C. said he thought the propriety of the amendment would strike the good sense of the committee at once. It was one of the most important offices of the State. Under his superintendence all the affairs of our educational interests were placed; and the too frequent change of this office had brought with it many evils. A different policy was introduced by each new Superintendent—an entire change of books usually recommended; and thus the permanency and stability of the system was destroyed, and its benefits correspondingly affected.

The question was taken on striking out, and lost.

Mr. SULLIVAN moved to strike out "Auditor General."

The CHAIR said that the question had been once taken and lost, and therefore the motion was not in order.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following as a substitute for the section:

"There shall be a Secretary of State, who shall be ex officio Superintendent of public Instruction, a State Treasurer, who shall be ex officio Commissioner of the Land Office, and an Auditor General, elected at each biennial general election, who shall hold their respective offices for the term of two years, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law."

Which was rejected.

Mr. CHAPEL then offered his substitute, as follows:

"There shall be a Secretary of State, who shall be ex officio Superintendent of Public Instruction, a Commissioner of the Land Office, who shall be ex officio State Treasurer, an Auditor General and an Attorney General, elected at each biennial general election, who shall hold their respective offices for the term of two years, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law."

Which was lost.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, section 1 was amended by inserting after "years," "each of whom shall keep an office at the seat of government."

Mr. GALE moved to insert "Doctor General" after "Auditor General."

Mr. HANSCOM asked if it was proposed that he, too, should reside at the seat of government?

The motion was not sustained.

Mr. McLEOD move to strike out section 2.

But the committee refused to strike out.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the words "a temporary," in section 3, were stricken out, and "an" inserted.

Sec. 4. The Secretary of State, State Treasurer and Auditor General shall keep their offices at the seat of government, and shall constitute a Board of State Auditors, for the examination and adjustment of all claims against the State, not otherwise provided for by law, or specially referred by the Legislature to some other tribunal. And shall also constitute a Board of State Canvassers, for determining the result of all elections for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Judges and State officers, and of such other elections as shall by law be referred to said board.

Mr. BUSH moved to strike out "shall keep their offices at the seat of government, and;" which motion prevailed.

Mr. BACKUS moved to strike out "shall constitute a board of State Auditors for the examination and adjustment of all claims against the State, not otherwise provided for by law, or referred by the Legislature to some other tribunal."

Mr. B. said that the object of the amendment was to place the State in the same position as individuals, in reference to their remedies. He wished to have the rights of the State tried where the citizens' rights are tried. That all matters not coming strictly within the purview of the Auditor General should be referred to some proper judicial tribunal. If this amendment should be adopted, it would prevent the creation of extra and unusual tribunals for the settlement of demands for and against the State. The same measure of justice should be dealt out from the State to the individual as is required between individuals; and therefore the same tribunal should be the common umpire.

Mr. HANSCOM said the adoption of the proposition of the gentleman would carry with it a great deal of difficulty. States had adopted a different rule in reference to claims than what they required of the citizens; and for very obvious reasons. The State would otherwise be dragged into a lawsuit by every petty claim, if the claimant thought he could obtain something more by that process. The State had tried the experiment once; and had not the law been repealed, we should have been in a far worse condition as a State than we are now.

The greatest fault that could be found with the proposition for a board of auditors was the fact that they generally pay too much, or rather pay claims which ought not to be allowed. They are too apt to grant too much. In this day of resuscitating old claims, it was best to be guarded as far as possible against being devoured. Among the numerous Galphin claims of the day, he had seen an account of one presented for furnishing materials for building Noah's Ark; and if Secretary Crawford could be retained as the agent, while Mr. Meredith should be the accounting officer, there might be danger of our being compelled to pay it. At any rate, the history of these times, in matters of claims, warned us to provide for the safest and best method of settling these matters.

Mr. BACKUS said he most certainly hoped never to see such a claim as that last alluded to, receive attention, and presumed he should not. But to one admission of the gentleman he wished to allude. The fact that a board of auditors were too liberal, as a general thing, with claimants, was the greatest of all reasons why such a board should not be allowed to sit as the judges in such matters. They had but one side of the story, and it was not brought before them in a proper way for them to make a proper judgment. And why take your Auditor General, Treasurer and Secretary of State to compose this board? They are not properly constituted to determine what claims are legally entitled to payment. Why not more properly make your judiciary constitute this board? They would bring their legal and equitable rules to bear upon the cases, and sift them with a thorough investigation. Justice to all parties, in such cases, would be more certain and more satisfactory; for the matter would be settled upon legal principles. If this board of auditors is applicable to the affairs of the State, why not apply it to all organizations under the government. Apply it to your counties, to your towns and school districts. The same principle applies; and if it is just and right in the one case it would be in the other.

The gentleman has alluded to the experience of the State in the settlement of its claims. The claim growing out of the State prison had been a fruitful theme of discussion. But had this claim been originally referred to the judiciary—placed before them for their decision—it would have been settled long ago, and much better to the satisfaction of all concerned. The judiciary was the best umpire for such cases, because it could bring every thing to the test of legal principles; it was the most just, because the most important; the most satisfactory, because the most thorough in its investigations; the cheapest, because its machinery was created for these very purposes; the most consistent with our institutions, because it provided the same tribunal for State and citizen. Other States had tried it, and its workings had proved satisfactory.

Mr. BUSH said that the argument of the gentleman who last occupied the floor, was a very plausible one; but the history of the United States and of this State might be very profitably examined. The people of this State had suffered immeasurably from the system proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS.] The claims growing out of the stopping of our internal improvements, very many of them, were settled in this way. And every one is well aware of the complaints growing out of the settlement of those claims. The most exorbitant demands were made for damages, and allowed. The manner proposed by the committee, of leaving all claims to be settled by the Board of Auditors, was decidedly preferable. All matters were first presented to the Auditor General, and if they did not come within his sphere; or if he rejected them, he formed part of the tribunal who were to pass a final judgment in the case. Such cases as he was required to allow, he would do so; but others went to this final umpire.

Mr. WHIPPLE—The question under discussion seems to involve the point whether matters of claims against the State shall be referred to a board of State Auditors, or to a judicial tribunal for settlement. Reference has been had to the history of our internal improvements and the difficulties growing out of them. They had, it was true, involved the State in a large amount of litigation; they had been the cause of a great deal of trouble; but his own experience had proved to him that had the State referred these claims in the first place to the judiciary, giving them the original jurisdiction, it would have been far better for the State. But the facts were that a board of public officers were first made to pass upon these claims, and then appeals were allowed from this board. The most enormous allowances were made; and whenever an appeal was taken, they were always reduced very much. He had known claims on which large allowances were made by the board, that, on a thorough examination, it was found the State did not owe a dollar.

Mr. W. was not prepared to go so far as the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BACKUS.] He was willing that claims should first be presented to this board, but did not wish their judgment to be conclusive on the State or the individual. An appeal should be allowed whenever the amount in controversy was very considerable. Heretofore, in cases of appeal, the amount was always greatly reduced. The case of Chapel, with which all were familiar, was reduced some eight hundred dollars; and numerous others, when tried on their merits, were found to have no better foundation. This section should be so fixed that if the board be retained, their decisions could not be final or conclusive, but that the State or the individual might seek his rights before the highest tribunal of the State. In matters where the amount was small, it might be injudicious to allow an appeal.

He had never known injustice done to the State or to the individual by this reference to the judiciary. His own experience was, that when the matter in controversy was submitted to a jury, the rights of the individual were guarded, and the interests of the State not neglected; so that justice was dealt out to all. So far as the justness of their decisions was concerned, he felt no hesitation in providing for the allowing of such appeals.

The workings of the whole matter in this State had been something like this. The State had broken its engagements. As a matter of course, men who had entered into contracts, applied to the State for damages. Every collateral or conceivable damage was brought into the account. One man had lost a horse, another had had a plow stolen, or he had accumulated useless property, &c., &c.; all these remote damages were brought into the account. But when the matters were sifted, and the actual and direct damage sustained arrived at, the claim dwindled down amazingly. The State prison claim, which had been alluded to, was another illustration of the working of this system. The claim was allowed by the present board, but was rejected when investigated by the scrutiny of legal proceedings.

It was far more important to the State than to the individual that this appeal should be provided for. Such the history of our own State would prove. These boards too frequently allowed items in the account which could not be claimed on any legal principle.

Mr. KINGSLY said he thought the article suited the views of both gentlemen. The decision of the board, as the article now stood, was not binding and conclusive.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to insert "from whose decision there shall be an appeal to the Supreme Court."

Mr. BACKUS—What would be the effect of this amendment? A man presents a claim to the Board of Auditors, and he is dissatisfied with their decision. What is the party's remedy? He must bring a writ of mandamus on this board of officers, and thus bring it before the court. Why compel him to resort to this? Why not refer the matter directly to that tribunal, without all this machinery?

The question was taken on Mr. BACKUS' motion, and lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. Lost.

Mr. CHAPEL moved to strike out "Auditor General," and insert "Commissioner of the Land Office," in the clause providing for a board of auditors.

Mr. C. said that a board of auditors in this State were compelled to go to various parts of the State to settle claims. The absence of some of the officers had been a cause of complaint; at least the Auditor General had complained. The inconsistency, too, of presenting claims to the Auditor General, and then an appeal to a board of auditors of which he should be one, would strike any one at a glance.

The motion prevailed.

Mr. CRARY moved to add the following to the end of section six; which was adopted: "The inspectors shall have the charge and superintendence of the State Prison, and shall appoint all the officers therein. All vacancies in the office of inspector shall be filled by the Governor till the next election."

On motion of Mr. RAYNALE, the word "two" was stricken out of last line of section six, and "six" inserted.

The committee then rose, and through their chairman reported "Article —, State Officers," with certain amendments, in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked.

Mr. McLEOD moved a call of the Convention, which was demanded; and there being a quorum in attendance,

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The Article entitled "State Officers" being under consideration,

Mr. BACKUS moved that the same be laid upon the table and ordered printed.

A division of the question being had, the article was laid upon the table, but the Convention refused to print.

Mr. HANSCOM moved the Convention adjourn; which was lost.

The question now recurring on the motion to lay upon the table the application for leave of absence for Mr. HASCALL, made prior to going into committee of the whole, the motion to lay upon the table was lost by yeas 9—nays 44.

Upon the question of granting leave, the yeas and nays having been ordered, the result was yeas 45—nays 7.

So leave was granted Mr. HASCALL for an indefinite period.

On motion of Mr. BRITAIN,

Resolved, That article —, entitled "Executive Department," be recommitted to the committee on executive department, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of so amending said article as to provide for the election of Speaker of the House of Representatives by the people.

Mr. GALE asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. LEACH for an indefinite period.

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the Convention adjourn; but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole on the general order.

Upon which the yeas and nays were demanded; when, upon calling the roll, a quorum of members not being in attendance,

On motion of Mr. STORY, a call of the House was ordered.

The roll being called, and a quorum of members answering to their names,

On motion of Mr. STOREY, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, (24th day,) June 29.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

The PRESIDENT called Mr. ROBERTS to the chair.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HANSCOM offered the following, which were adopted:

Resolved, That the President of this Convention be paid the same amount of mileage allowed to other members, and that he receive six dollars for his per diem; and that the same shall be paid upon the certificate of one of the Secretaries of the Convention.

Resolved, That the same per diem and mileage allowed to the present officers of the Convention be paid to the Secretary and Sergeant-at-arms pro tem., and that the usual certificate be drawn therefor.

Mr. S. CLARK moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the above resolutions were adopted.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD would call attention to the phraseology used in the last resolution in relation to mileage to be allowed to officers of the Convention. It does not provide for payment of mileage, but assumes it. It creates an interest in favor of such payment, which should not be countenanced, unless it was the intention to carry it out by appropriation. It may be called an entering wedge. He [Mr. B.] was opposed to such legislation in all cases. If there was no intention to provide for mileage, why put it in the resolution?

Mr. DANFORTH hoped the vote would be reconsidered. The law provides that the President shall receive the same compensation as Speaker of the House of Representatives. He would be entitled to six dollars a day and mileage by law. There was no necessity for the passage of the resolution.

The motion to reconsider prevailed.

The question was stated to be on the adoption of the first resolution.

Mr. HANSCOM had offered the resolution at the suggestion of the treasurer, who had doubts as to the mode of certifying.

Mr. WALKER—It only relates to the mode of certifying. The President cannot certify in his own favor.

The first resolution was adopted.

The second resolution was read.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out that part relating to mileage.

Mr. RAYNALE had understood that it had been the custom to pay mileage one way to the Secretary and Sergeant-at-arms. He thought mileage one way should be allowed; if no inducements were held out, it might be difficult to obtain officers at the commencement of a session.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD thought it altogether wrong. It gives decided advantage to one man coming here over others. He comes here as a candidate for this office with others, and though through the intervention of a friend he may get the temporary appointment for which he will receive his per diem, he ought not to be paid mileage.

Mr. HANSCOM said the proceedings of the Convention had no doubt been expedited by the former Clerk of the House making arrangements and preparing lists for the Convention. The trifle of mileage he thought ought to be allowed. The Secretary pro tem. had probably saved the State $500 by making arrangements previous to the meeting of the Convention, and by having the lists prepared.

Mr. BRITAIN said the clerk of the House had received two hundred and fifty dollars between the adjournment of the Legislature and the meeting of the Convention.

Mr. FRALICK'S amendment was concurred in, and the resolution as amended adopted.

Mr. STOREY moved that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole on the general order; but the motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. WITHERELL, a call of the House was had, and a quorum being found present, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. STOREY renewed his motion to go into committee of the whole, and the same was again lost.

The PRESIDENT took the chair.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to adjourn till Monday the 8th of July next.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to amend by striking out "Monday, the 8th," and inserting "Wednesday, the 10th."

Mr. HANSCOM thought the propriety of adjourning was a matter of grave consideration. The time proposed for the adjournment was too long. In fact, he was opposed to adjourning. A great deal of business might be got through with in the course of the day; though he thought a call of the Convention should again be had.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH was of opinion that if the Convention adjourned, it ought to adjourn to the 10th of July. He thought it improper that gentlemen sent here by the people should slip off and leave the Convention without a quorum. As it would be impossible to do business, he thought it best to adjourn.

Mr. CHAPEL offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That this Convention adjourn till Monday, July 8th, next, and that during the period of adjournment no member or officer shall be entitled to his per diem.

Mr. EATON moved to insert in lieu of "July 8th," "September 1."

A call of the Convention being had, and a quorum of members not being in attendance, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. STOREY offered the following:

Whereas, A majority of the members of this Convention, by obtaining leave of absence or otherwise, have absented themselves, and the number present is now reduced to less than a quorum, and the only power left those in attendance is to adjourn or send the sergeant-at-arms after the absentees;

And whereas, There is no reasonable prospect of obtaining the attendance of a quorum at an earlier day than Tuesday, July 9th; therefore,

Resolved, That this Convention stand adjourned until the 9th day of July, at half-past 8 o'clock A. M.

Mr. WALKER hoped his colleague would withdraw his amendment. Nothing could be acted upon except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CHAPEL withdrew his substitute.

The substitute offered by Mr. STOREY being read, and the question being on its adoption,

Mr. GALE inquired if it was in order?

The CHAIR stated that, under the rule, a majority of the members elect shall be a quorum to do business, but a less number may adjourn; it does not specify whether for a given time, or a time previously prescribed by the Convention.

Mr. CORNELL understood that, under the rule, a minority might adjourn; but he did not know whether sine die or to a particular day, or only to the time prescribed by the Convention. He wished some gentleman to explain. It appeared to him that they had no authority to move the previous question or any other, except to adjourn. They had no power to do any thing except what the majority had given them. The body [said Mr. C.] is not here, nor the soul either.

The CHAIR said a question might arise as to the power to call the previous question. He was of opinion that the question of adjournment could be taken, and none other.

The PRESIDENT put the question on the last resolution—that this Convention stand adjourned until the 9th day of July, at half-past 8 o'clock A. M.

Mr. CLARK called for the ayes and noes.

The President was of opinion that the ayes and noes might be ordered, so long as there were ten members, on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MASON appealed from the decision of the chair.

Mr. BUSH stated his opinion to be, that as a quorum was not present they could make no rule, but must abide by the rules adopted by the Convention; the rule gave them power only to adjourn. The Convention had prescribed that the adjournment should be to meet at two o'clock in the afternoon, and at eight in the morning. At those times the roll must be called, and if a quorum is not present they may again adjourn.

The decision of the chair was sustained, and the question being taken on the resolution to adjourn, it was carried, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Axford, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Church, Crary, Eastman, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hathaway, Kingsley, Mason, Mosher, Newberry, Prevost, Raynale, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Whipple, Witherell, Woodman—32.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Backus, Britain, Asahel Brown, Bush, Chapel, S. Clark, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Orr, N. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, President—20.

The President declared the Convention adjourned until Tuesday, the 9th day of July next, at half-past 8 o'clock, A. M.

TUESDAY, (25th day,) July 9.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

The roll being called, a quorum of members was in attendance.

The journal of the last day's proceedings was approved.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. EATON in the chair.

Mr. CRARY moved to take up for consideration the article on Corporations.

Mr. COOK said the gentleman composing the minority of the committee, who had made a report accompanied by an article, were not yet in attendance, and he thought the article should not be taken up. They would probably be in their seats tomorrow.

Mr. CRARY—I cannot help that; they should be here.

The motion was lost.

The article "Education" being the first on the general order for consideration,

Mr. WALKER moved to pass it over, as the member who was chairman in committee of the whole when the article was last under consideration was not in his seat.

The motion was carried.

Article —, "Exemptions and the Rights of Married Woman" was passed over, on motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, who remarked that another article would be reported by a portion of the committee.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of "Article —, County Officers and County Government."

Section 1 was read, and passed without amendment.

Sec. 2. No county now organized by law shall ever be reduced by the organization of new counties to less than six hundred square miles.

Mr. FRALICK moved to strike out of section two the word "six," and insert "four."

Mr. BUSH hoped the amendment would prevail. No great injury could ensue from it. The Legislature always handled these matters with great care, and great inconveniences might hereafter result if, by the Constitution, they were prohibited from acting in cases where the public welfare required that a county should be reduced to less than six hundred square miles.

Mr. COOK said that sixteen townships contained 576 square miles, and the committee therefore agreed on six hundred. They thought that sixteen towns was as small a number as any county should contain. If the amendment was adopted, the Legislature would be flooded with petitions for the division of counties, and much trouble would ensue. He was in favor of the section as it stood.

Mr. BRITAIN, for the very reasons given by the gentleman, [Mr. Cook,] was in favor of a change. Sixteen townships contained 576 square miles, and that was large enough for one county.

A division of the question being had, the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. FRALICK moved to add at the end of section 2, "except the county of Wayne;" which was not agreed to.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out section 2; but the committee refused to strike out.

Sec. 3. In each organized county there shall be one sheriff, a county clerk, who shall be the clerk of all the courts of record to be held in the county, a county treasurer, who shall be ex officio register of deeds, one county surveyor, a prosecuting attorney and one or more coroners, chosen by the qualified electors thereof, once in two years, and as often as vacancies shall happen, and whose duties and powers shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out of section 3, "and one or more coroners."

Mr. C. said his reason for making the motion was that he considered the office of coroner useless, as there were no duties to be performed by that officer unless the sheriff was sued, or in case of his death. By statute, the ordinary duties of coroners have been devolved on justices of the peace.

The motion prevailed.

Mr. KINGSLEY moved to strike out the words "who shall be ex-officio," and insert "a."

Mr. K. said the offices of treasurer and register of deeds in large counties were both desirable, and he could see no good reason for uniting them. In his county, the office was worth one thousand dollars.

Mr. GOODWIN thought the motion a proper one. The office of register was not only an important one, but the duties were entirely separate and distinct from those of the treasurer. There could be no reason for uniting them, unless the duties of register were light; and this was not the case.

Mr. CORNELL remarked that he was a member of the committee which reported the article under consideration. He thought it would be well enough to unite the two offices in small counties, as it would be a saving of expense; but in large counties it might be well to keep them separate.

Mr. GARDINER thought if he could discern the signs of the times, there would be business enough in the counties for both officers. It was contemplated to transfer many duties now performed elsewhere, to the counties, and business would be increased in both offices.

Mr. BAGG, in addition to what had been said, would remark that in the county of Wayne the register of deeds had to employ three clerks, and the treasurer one, so great was the amount of business done in both of these offices.

Mr. CHURCH thought if the committee had reported a union of the offices of county treasurer and county clerk, it would have been well enough.

Mr. S. CLARK hoped the motion would not prevail. If, as gentlemen argued, the two offices were important, and salaries large, let the salaries be reduced. In the State of New York, in counties containing a population of fifty thousand inhabitants, the two offices were united, and the system worked well. He considered it entirely useless to retain them both. The argument that the offices were important, and should therefore be retained, was not good. If they were united, as they could easily be, it would be a saving of from ten to fifteen thousand dollars to the counties, in fees, &c. He was in favor of uniting the offices of clerk and register of deeds.

Mr. CRARY could not agree with the delegate from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] or the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. CLARK.] What was the duty of a clerk? It was his business to attend the courts when in session. In the larger counties, the courts are in session four months of the year. During this time he must hire a deputy, or farm out the office.

Mr. COOK (in his seat.) Are they not farmed out now?

Mr. C.—Undoubtedly; but there is no necessity for holding out other inducements to farm them out. The clerk also attends the board of supervisors. For this he is paid extra, and for all extra services he would be paid, whether the offices were united or disconnected. Besides, a person may make a good clerk and a bad register. He may be a good register and make a very bad clerk. A clerk must have some knowledge of the law. He need not be a professional lawyer; but without some knowledge of the law in the line of his business, he cannot discharge the duties of his office.

Mr. J. CLARK remarked that when both offices were combined there had been no trouble in the small counties, in procuring the services of efficient men. At the time of the union of these offices the system worked well. As his friend from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] had said, it would be a great saving of expense to the counties.

Mr. ROBERTSON hoped the amendment would prevail. He thought it was a matter which should be left to the people themselves to regulate. It had formerly been the custom in the county of Macomb to elect one man to fill the two offices; but when he became rich, and the business of the offices was sufficient to occupy the time of two men, the offices were filled separately. The register in Macomb county received probably about six hundred dollars; and four years was as long as any man could do the writing of such an office. The clerk received from three to four hundred dollars. By a division of the offices one man could not always hold two at the same time, but such would always be the case if they were blended in the Constitution. If new duties were to be thrown on the county treasurers they would not desire the office of register, and could not perform the duties, particularly if the duties of the Auditor General in regard to non-resident lands were to be transferred to the several counties.

Mr. HANSCOM was decidedly in favor of the motion. The business in his county (Oakland) required the time and attention of each of these officers for the transaction of their respective duties. There was no affinity between the duties of treasurer and register; and as had been remarked by the gentleman last up, it was a matter that should be left to the people to regulate. He was opposed to the principle of having one head with five or six clerks.

Mr. CHURCH thought that in a large majority of the counties the offices of register and clerk might be combined. In his own county (Kent) the register and clerk were both paid by the county considerable sums for services rendered the county. Why were these services charged for? Because, it was alleged, the compensation received in the way of fees from work done for individuals, was not, in itself, sufficient for their support. If the two offices were united upon one person, then his receipts from both would be sufficient to enable him to do all the work in each required by the county, without charge.

The small, or new counties, as they are called, would ever constitute the larger part of the State. Our population did not tend so much to a large increase in the older parts of the State as to diffusion throughout the unoccupied territory thereof. The high price of the land near villages and densely settled counties, drove immigration north; and in all the arrangements they were making they should have regard to that fact at present, and to it in the future. The great object to be attained was not merely that the counties might obtain from the officers now under consideration gratuitous services, but that such officers might perform the duties imposed upon them by law at reduced prices to individuals. In some parts of New England the charge for recording a deed did not exceed two shillings, while in this State it cost one dollar or more. A farmer proposing to make a small loan, or to secure a small debt, paid a dollar at least for the drafting of a mortgage, half a dollar for the acknowledgment thereof, and then, when it was executed, came the recording fee, always counted against him, about nine or ten shillings more; the aggregate of incidental charges making a disproportionate per centum upon the principal thus secured. Just so in the case of a purchase of a small piece of land contiguous to his farm.

He contended farther in favor of the proposed union of the offices of county clerk and county register, or that the Legislature should have the power to prescribe the mode of their union whenever desired by any county.

Mr. BUSH asked whether it was customary to pay a salary to coroners, when their fees did not support them? It was not; and so it should be in regard to a clerk. There was not the least necessity to pay a salary to a clerk; if the fees of his office did not support him, he could look to something else. In many of the counties, no salary was paid that officer—his pay being only such fees as the law gave him. In New York, he believed, the matter was left open for the Legislature to regulate as they saw fit. In this State he thought the present arrangement in regard to county offices was satisfactory to the people. He had heard no complaint of grievances by them; in this hall he had heard the first expression of dissatisfaction against the office of register. That officer was paid only the fees given by law for the performance of his duties; but if he did business for the county, not properly coming within his official duties, it was nothing but just that he should be paid for it; he had a perfect right to charge for it. As there had been no demonstration in favor of a change, he hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. FRALICK was in favor of the amendment. He wanted the matter left open so that if the western and small counties saw fit, they might elect one person to fill both offices or not. The duties of register in the county of Wayne were equal to those of any State office, unless perhaps, those of the Auditor General's. So it was with the clerk's office; and he was not disposed to add new duties to either of them. It had not been many days since in that hall he had heard serious and strong objections urged against the appointing power; and if he properly understood the section under consideration, the appointing power under it was great. The treasurer would, in some counties, appoint five or six clerks, at a salary of from $700 to $800. So far as he knew, the old counties were opposed to any such combination.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought the difficulties of the case could be met. It seemed evident from the statements of gentlemen from the more populous counties, that in those counties the offices could not with propriety be combined, while it was equally evident that in the smaller counties, the duties of the register of deeds ought to be imposed on the clerk of the county.

In case the various suggestions prevailed, if no one else did, he would offer an amendment to section 3, as follows:

"In counties containing not less than 25,000 inhabitants, the offices of clerk and register of deeds may be separated by the Legislature."

This would meet the case of large counties, while in all the small counties, these offices should remain identified. There were various reasons why the number of county officers should be reduced as far as practicable. In many counties the multiplication of officers with few duties to perform was a nuisance. The whole duties of treasurer, clerk and register, would not keep one man well employed. In the county where he resided, (St. Joseph,) a county of some thirteen or fifteen thousand people, he was sure that the duties of both clerk and register could be performed by one person without difficulty. In the county of Cass, he was told by a gentleman near him, that the duties of the county clerk could not fairly occupy more than one-third of his time. Besides, there were generally three expectants for the occupancy of each county office. These he would cut off. Some of them did nothing but lay back and wait their turn, sucking out the substance and living as vampires on the community until they could oust an incumbent or come uppermost by rotation. It was the interest of the public to diminish the number of such candidates by abolishing an office where it could be done.

Mr. KINGSLEY—Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who have addressed the Convention on this subject say the duties of the two offices can be performed by one person; yet they all know that these officers employ clerks. In the county of Washtenaw the clerk in the register's office receives twenty-five dollars per month, while the register gets about seventy-five, and lives eight miles from the county seat. It is much better than farming. I hope the new counties will all be large in a few years, and that their business will be equal to ours. The gentleman from St. Clair [Mr. J. CLARK] is from New York, and imbibed his ideas of uniting the offices there.

Mr. J. CLARK—The gentleman is mistaken. I am not from the State of New York.

Mr. S. CLARK desired to make only a remark or two on the subject. What the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] had stated, might be correct—that a good register might not make a good clerk; but it did not follow that a good clerk would not make a good register. What, he would ask, were the duties of a clerk? Each member must be familiar with them. His duties were to keep the record of the courts, to be in attendance during their sessions, to attend the meetings of the boards of supervisors, &c., &c. His duties were such as by no means to disqualify him from being a good register. Gentlemen had raised a cry about "farming out" the office. There was no farming out the office. A clerk usually had a deputy in the office to attend to the duties during his necessary absence, and it was indispensable that there should be a deputy. The plain and only question was, whether the offices should be combined, and a saving of several hundred dollars made to the counties, or not. As the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] had stated, these officers were paid a salary, amounting to several hundred dollars, by the counties, in addition to their legal fees, which might easily be saved if the offices were united on one person. The duties were compatible, and should be united. They had been united in counties in the State of New York, were five times more business was done than in any county in this State, save perhaps, the county of Wayne. In regard to complaints being made, the fact was not as stated by the member from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH.] In his county (Kalamazoo) there was great complaint.

Mr. CRARY—I did not state that the duties of the two offices were incompatible, but that they were not necessarily compatible. A clerk must have some knowledge of the law to perform his duties as they should be. But if it were so desirable to unite the two offices, why had not the people elected one person instead of two? They had the privilege. He was opposed to all the propositions of union, but was willing to leave it to the boards of supervisors of the several counties—he was willing to leave the matter as it stood in the present constitution. In some counties they had elected one person to discharge the duties of two offices, and to this he saw not the least objection, if they desired it. In reference to what had been said about paying these officers, in addition to legal fees, he would ask, if by combining them, they expected the counties would be rid of paying them for extra services, work done for the county? The board of supervisors would allow their charges for work done. He granted that in some counties too large salaries had been paid to some of the county officers, but a combination of the offices would only give a larger salary to some big fish.

Mr. BAGG said, but a short time before, in the Convention, there had been a disposition to strike at the head of the Auditor General, and distribute the duties of his office among the several counties, and at the State Treasurer, to distribute his also; and now there was a proposition to centralize and unite two of the most important county offices. In the county of Wayne, the office of register was worth two thousand dollars, and that of treasurer was worth twelve hundred. Now, he would ask, was it democratic, and did it comport with the doctrine of rotation in office and the cardinal principles of democracy, to unite two such offices? It was, indeed, a singular idea, that because the salaries were large they should be united. If that were a correct principle, it would be better to put them all together for the benefit of one man, and make one great nabob. It might be better for the new counties to have the offices united, but he thought the matter should be left with the Legislature.

Mr. SKINNER, when he came here, expected to reduce all expenses where it could be properly done. The gentleman from Ingham [Mr. BUSH] was much mistaken in supposing that no complaint had been made in regard to the expenses of county officers. He [Mr. S.] had heard more complaint about county expenses than any thing else.

He thought the committee that reported the article under consideration had erred in reporting a union of the two offices they did. There was no affinity between the duties of the treasurer and those of a register; but he was decidedly in favor of combining the offices of clerk and register. He knew that no one man could perform the duties of the offices in the populous counties; they were so onerous that it would be impossible for him to do so; yet he could be at the head and overlook all the business and see that it was done faithfully. This would be a considerable saving of expense. One person at the head could easily have all the business done. The operation of performing the duties was mechanical and required no brains. One good head, with a sufficient number of clerks, where they were necessary, with proper salaries, was sufficient. If the number of offices were multiplied, the expenses must necessarily be increased. He was in favor of giving one man as much as he could do.

Mr. BUSH said the gentleman last up misunderstood him. He [Mr. B.] merely stated in his remarks that there had been no complaint of the number of county offices. He said nothing about complaint of expenses and fees.

Mr. WALKER had listened attentively to the triangular and quadrangular discussion that had been going on, in order that he might know how to act on the question, and to see what would be the probable result. He had begun to see what some gentlemen desired, and it was that one man should be elected to fill these two offices, with a view to farming them out or to make appointments to fill the very office which the people now filled by electing a man of their own choice. This would be the practical effect of the matter. Now, how did the case stand? In some counties the salaries of these officers were greater than that paid to any of the State officers, and yet it was proposed to combine them. One man could not perform the duties, and the consequence will be that he will farm them out. To this he was opposed, as well as to the appointing power proposed to be given in the section as reported. As stated by his colleague, it had been the practice in the county of Macomb to elect one person to fill two offices; but when he become rich from the fees of office, the people took the matter in their own hands and elected a person for each office, and each of them had duties enough to perform. Unite the two offices, and they would be farmed out before the election took place. There certainly was great inconsistency in the cry of taking away all patronage from the Executive, and piling it up in the several counties.

If the combination were so desirable and so much demanded by the people, why was it not done? They had the power to do so. Allusion had been made, in the discussion, to New England. He had resided in New England, and in the county from which he came, there were twenty-seven registers. He felt confident that no saving of expense would be made by combining the two offices.

Mr. WILLIAMS—The gentleman from Macomb [Mr. WALKER] assumes that each of the several county officers has duties enough to perform, and that if combined they must be farmed out. Now I assert deliberately, that in two-thirds of the counties of the State, a single business man can be found who will transact more business and perform more drudgery than all the county officers together. It may not be so with the county of Macomb. I cannot speak with certainty of that county. I was never there but once, but it so happened that I then had business at a county office, and I could not find a single county officer at his office. This certainly did not show a very severe pressure of business. The county officers of Macomb may have full employment, but I do not believe it. I remember well that on another occasion I found all the county officers playing ball on the plain.

I am constrained to believe that in a great majority of the counties, a single man can easily perform the whole public business. The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] seems to think that if any offices are combined, it must be for the benefit of the big fish. I find a few sly words towards the end of the section—"whose duties and powers shall be prescribed by law." Let the Legislature prescribe the duties, fix the fees, give the officer a fair and just compensation, and then elect a man who can and will work, and all the duties will be better performed, and perhaps at a great saving to the public. So far from gratifying big fish, I believe it a ready method of extirpating that class of natural loafers who swarm in every county, waiting for a revolution of the wheel, or a change in the ascendancy of parties, to bring them up. The gentleman from Calhoun says he would leave it to the board of supervisors to combine offices when they think it necessary. Why, sir, half of the board might, for themselves or friends, be looking forward to the enjoyment of these offices proposed to be combined. In each township there are always one or two loafers who study to shun work, and reach the dignity of a county office. Such men can get up a spurious public opinion, and bring it to bear on the action of the board of supervisors. When the sky falls, I think it probable that offices now separate may be combined by the action of the supervisors.

Mr. WALKER—To what office did the gentleman from St. Joseph apply when his business carried him into Macomb county?

Mr. WILLIAMS—In searching for one office, I went to every public office, and found every door locked. It was several years since, and about four o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. McCLELLAND had listened to the discussion, and thought the suggestion of the gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] a good one. If left to the board of supervisors, there would be no uniformity throughout the State in regard to these offices, which was certainly desirable.

Mr. BRITAIN rose merely to call the attention of members to the question before them. In the long discussion, no one had discussed the proposition before the committee.

Mr. CHAPEL said it was assuming a good deal to suppose that he could perfect the section, yet he would read a substitute which he proposed to offer. It was as follows:

"In each organized county there shall be one sheriff, a county clerk, who shall be the clerk of all the courts of record and the board of supervisors, and discharge the duties of county auditor, a county treasurer, a register of deeds, a county surveyor, a prosecuting attorney, one or more overseers of the poor, who shall be ex officio coroners, a board of supervisors, who may increase or decrease the number of the officers, as the interest of the counties may require, who shall be chosen by the qualified electors thereof once in two years, and as often as vacancies shall happen, whose duties and powers shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. C. said it would be seen that by the substitute the board of supervisors could diminish the officers if necessary.

Mr. MOORE thought the substitute something like what was desired. He thought the board of supervisors the proper persons to say whether it was proper to combine the offices.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. KINGSLEY, and carried.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend section 3 by inserting after "county," where it first occurs in line two, "and register of deeds," and by striking out in lines two and three, the words "register of deeds."

Mr. McCLELLAND would suggest to the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] to offer all the amendments at once.

Mr. WILLIAMS—That would be taking my thunder. I have no objection.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend further by adding at the end of the section, "in counties containing more than 25,000 inhabitants, the offices of county clerk and register of deeds may be separated by the Legislature."

Mr. BRITAIN asked for a division of the question on the two propositions.

Mr. B. said he had listened patiently to the discussion that had been going on, although he considered it out of order, as it was not on the proposition before the committee. The arguments of the gentleman from Kalamazoo seemed based on the assertion that the offices were united in the State of New York. Such was the fact, but it did not follow, nor was it any reason, that they should be united in this State. It was said by members that by uniting the two offices a decrease in the county expenses would ensue; but he was confident this would not be the case. In the State of New York, in the same office, it cost more for having work done than here; larger fees were paid. In his own county the plan of electing these officers had worked well. They always had the best talent to fill them, and they were frequently filled by young men who, by economy and prudence, were enabled to educate and fit themselves for future usefulness.

The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] had said that the offices were incompatible, and the gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] had taken issue with him, and said that a clerk could, with his knowledge of the law and an acquaintance with his duties, perform the duties of register. He thought the legal profession should be satisfied with the assurance of the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. SKINNER,] that it required "no brains" to discharge the duties of the office. It was a notorious fact that the legal fraternity were the worst writers to be found, and therefore they would not make good registers.

He was in favor of leaving the offices open to competition among the people. How frequently was it the case that men went into these offices and fitted themselves, as he before stated, for future usefulness? He had known men to go and live at the county seat for $200, in order that they might obtain the means of improvement. In new States like our own, there were always land agencies and other work these men could get, sufficient to compensate them, and for which they were willing to labor. The gentlemen from Macomb have told us that it has formerly been the custom in that county to elect one man to fill two offices, and it has become necessary to separate them.

He hoped members had not returned here for the purpose of making offices for their friends. The combination of these offices would be preparing offices for persons advanced in life, with large salaries, and taking them from those who had heretofore held them, and who held them to prepare themselves for future usefulness.

Mr. S. CLARK—Did the gentleman base his argument on the assumption that I said a clerk must be a lawyer?

Mr. BRITAIN—I understood the gentleman to say that it was necessary for a clerk to have a knowledge of the law.

Mr. S. CLARK—I did not say so. I do not know a single member of the bar who is a county clerk. My argument was to dispense with one of the officers and save a large annual expense to the counties.

Mr. CRARY—As I have been the means of getting up this discussion between the gentlemen who have just taken their seats, I will state what I said. My remark was that it was necessary for a clerk to have some knowledge of the law. This is necessary in order that he may keep a correct record of judicial proceedings. I believe the gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. S. CLARK] is a farmer.

Mr. S. CLARK—It is true that I am an humble farmer, and have also had some experience in the practice of law; and it is equally true that I will never degrade a respectable profession by casting reflections on its members. It was this course, pursued by certain members of the bar, that had degraded the profession and brought it into such disrepute that it was only necessary to cry "lawyer," to bring odium on a person. Such reflections he despised and scorned.

Mr. WILLARD—Mr. Chairman, as the Sergeant-at-Arms seems to be asleep, I would suggest the propriety of having him waked up by the Doorkeeper.

Mr. ORR remarked that he was willing to leave it to the people to say whether the offices should be united or not; if they wanted both, let them have them.

Mr. O. then read an amendment he proposed to offer.

On motion of Mr. BAGG, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The committee, through their chairman, reported the article back to the Convention, and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. EATON in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of "Article —, County Officers and County Government."

The CHAIR stated the question to be on the amendment offered to section 3, by the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] by inserting after "county," where it first occurred in the 2d line, the words "and register of deeds," and by striking out in lines 2 and 3 the words "register of deeds." Also, by adding at the end of the section, "in counties containing more than 25,000 inhabitants, the offices of county clerk and register of deeds may be separated by the Legislature."

Mr. WALKER said he rose to make an explanation. At the time the gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] visited the county of Macomb, and found no one in the county offices, the same person held the office of clerk and register of deeds, and he was a whig.

Mr. WILLIAMS—It seems, then, that a whig can perform the duties of both offices and play half the time.

Mr. GOODWIN said as there were some considerations that had not been alluded to, which might have a bearing upon the proper consideration of this question, he would detain the attention of the committee for a few moments. He thought that the practical workings of the proposed combination had not been clearly presented to the committee. It was true that the emoluments of the county offices in the large counties were very considerable, more even than our State offices; but this would ever be so under whatever system was adopted. But it was necessary that a proper responsibility was secured for the proper performance of every public duty; and it might be questioned whether, in imposing the duties of clerk of the courts and register upon one individual, that object would be accomplished. Besides, it would be but fair and right for a proper distribution of these emoluments.

The amendment proposed was very objectionable in one particular—that it made the register clerk of all the courts; that of judge of probate as well as all the others. Now, it was known to all that the fees of that officer for his clerical duties constituted almost his entire compensation, and in order to secure such officer a proper compensation, a salary would have to be provided. The force of this objection would be seen at once, and would suggest the impropriety of the proposition in this particular.

It seemed to him that a misapprehension of the bearing of this question on the new counties existed. The new counties, it was true, were thinly populated; but they were fast filling up, and as a consequence their business was increasing. The business of the older counties would remain nearly stationary, while that of the newer counties was greatly increasing, and it would not be long before they would be close upon the older ones. The county which the gentleman [Mr. CHURCH] represents, was not even mentioned in the present constitution, and was not organized; but now it has three representatives on this floor. The business in the register's office incident to the settlement of a new county was very much more than the same amount of population would require in the older counties; and on the assumption that these counties were to go on increasing, it must be presumed that the proper discharge of the duties, and a proper personal responsibility, would dictate a separate officer for these distinct duties.

Another consideration which affected these new counties was the extent of territory attached thereto for judicial purposes. Several counties were attached to Kent, and of course all of their business was transacted by the officers of that county. And this was the case with all the newer counties, and would continue to be the case until the whole State was settled.

It had been urged that by combining these two offices they would be less expensive to the counties. But, was this so? The fees of course must be uniform throughout the State; or else the business of one office be made to pay a part of the county expenses. And was it a matter of right that a few individuals should be heavily taxed in the way of fees for the support of other county expenses, because they have public business to transact through their county offices? Was it usual for private individuals to pay for services for the county?

If a course shall be adopted which will combine these offices, it would be but increasing so much the compensation of the officers, without diminishing the public burdens, and the greater emoluments thrown upon the officer without securing the attention and responsibility which would be secured were the duties properly separated. It was but just and right that every duty which was of sufficient importance to command the time and attention of an individual, should be imposed on individual responsibility.

But, if the object sought by the amendment was in accordance with the views of the Convention, it would be better to leave it with the respective boards of supervisors. They would be the better judges of the wishes of their respective counties; or, if the people deemed it expedient, they could elect the same person to both of these offices. This would be better. And thus in the smaller counties the difficulties would be obviated, and the very desirable object of securing a personal responsibility would thus be secured.

A division of the question being called on the amendment, the committee refused to strike out.

Mr. MORRISON moved to add at the end of section 3, "it shall be competent for the Board of Supervisors in the several counties containing less than 25,000 inhabitants, to combine the offices of County Clerk and Register of Deeds in one office."

Mr. M. said he thought his proposition embodied the wishes and feelings of gentlemen who had spoken, and he therefore offered it.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out "25,000" and insert "20,000;" and a division of the question being called for, the committee struck out "25,000."

Mr. COOK moved to fill the blank with "30,000;" which motion did not prevail.

The question recurring upon filling the blank with "20,000," the same was lost.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out the words "containing less than 25,000 inhabitants."

Mr. CORNELL remarked that there had been a good deal of discussion on the subject, and all felt anxious to retrench; but it seemed they could not agree on a plan. He had given the subject some attention, and come to the conclusion that it should begin at the ballot box—be acted upon by the people themselves. It seemed that the question had resolved itself to this—shall the Supervisors have the power to legislate to some extent? He thought they were competent. They had the people at their elbows, and if abuses crept in they could be soon corrected, under the immediate supervision of the people.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. CRARY to strike out, and carried.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the words "or disconnect the same," were added to the amendment.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the amendment of Mr. MORRISON by inserting after "deeds," the words "or county clerk and judge of probate."

Mr. B. said as this was a new proposition, he trusted the committee would pardon him for detaining them a short time. It would be seen that by his amendment, if a county clerk had not business to occupy his time, the board of supervisors could give him something to do.

Much had been said about the injustice that would be done the new counties by retaining the office of register of deeds separate and distinct from that of the clerk. He considered that the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] had successfully answered all the objections urged by gentlemen against the office of register, and shown that the new counties, on account of their rapidly increasing population, could not dispense with that officer. The large amount of territory frequently attached to new counties, must, even in these counties, though thinly populated, throw quite an amount of business in the register's office. He thought the office of register was one that should be left to the people. How many young men, fully competent to discharge the duties, were there who would be glad to obtain the office even in the new counties? Reduce the price of recording deeds and mortgages to four shillings, reduce it to three shillings, and the office would always be filled. He had heard of one man who had all his deeds, &c., recorded for one shilling each, while he, the register, walked about the streets and put two shillings in his pocket. He knew another who paid two shillings for the recording, while he pocketed six. So it would be seen that it was not necessary to abolish the office to reduce the expenses.

If (said Mr. B.) it is necessary to give the clerk more to do, if he has not business to keep him employed, then give him the work of the judge of probate. If he was not mistaken, there was more propriety in blending these two offices than those of clerk and register.

Mr. SULLIVAN thought the duties of these offices incompatible; more so than those of clerk and register. The duties of a judge of probate could not be performed by a deputy.

Mr. BRITAIN remarked that he offered the amendment with diffidence. It was for the consideration of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment lost.

Mr. WALKER moved to strike out of section 3, the words, "who shall be the clerk of all the courts of record to be held in the county."

Mr. W. said that a section in the article "Judiciary," defined the duties of clerk.

The motion was carried.

Mr. MOORE said he was a little too late, but he should like to hear the reasons for striking out. Was it to create another office? The committee should look to these things.

Mr. CHAPEL withdrew his substitute offered in the forenoon.

Mr. ROBERTS offered the following as a substitute for the section:

"In each organized county there shall be one sheriff, a county clerk, a county treasurer, a county surveyor, and a prosecuting attorney, chosen by the qualified electors thereof, once in two years, and as often as vacancies shall happen, and whose duties and powers shall be prescribed by law: counties having more than twenty thousand inhabitants may separate the duties of register of deeds from the office of county clerk in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe."

Mr. S. CLARK hoped the substitute would prevail. It contained the substance of the proposition of the gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH.] He thought that the offices of clerk and register should be combined, to save unnecessary expense. The arguments of the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. GOODWIN] had but little force. It was not a sound reason that, because in the old counties the fees or salaries were large, the office of register should be retained. The fees could be cut down, and they would be when the people complained of them. The gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] had stated that in one office he had heard that the register had his deeds, mortgages, &c., recorded for one shilling. Then two shillings were enough to be paid for that work. As remarked by the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] he was in favor of cutting off these greedy expectants and hangers-on for office, by reducing the fees to a proper value, and combining offices where it could be done.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the substitute by inserting after the word "treasurer," "a register of deeds." Carried.

Mr. WILLARD moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; but the committee refused to rise.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, all after "law," of the substitute, was stricken out.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the substitute, and a division of the same being demanded, the committee refused to strike out section 3.

Sec. 4. The county clerk, county treasurer, judge of probate and prosecuting attorney, shall hold their offices at the county seat.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend by striking out "prosecuting attorney," and inserting "register of deeds." Carried.

Mr. WILLARD moved to strike out "judge of probate;" but the committee refused to strike out.

Sec. 5 was read and passed without amendment.

Sec. 6. A board of supervisors, consisting of one to be chosen from each organized township, shall be established in each county, with such powers, to be uniform throughout the State, as is hereinafter prescribed.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, section 6 was amended by adding at the end thereof, "and as shall be prescribed by law."

On motion of Mr. FRALICK, the words "to be uniform throughout the State," were stricken out.

Sec. 7 was not amended.

Sec. 8. The board of supervisors shall have power to organize new townships, and may grant privileges to construct bridges or mill dams, or to lay out roads in their respective counties; but no township shall be organized of less dimensions than the United States survey thereof.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend section 8 by striking out to and including "mill dams," and inserting, "The board of supervisors shall have the exclusive power of organizing and dividing townships;" which motion did not prevail.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to add to section 8: "and exclusive power to pass acts creating local corporations under general laws, and for such other local purposes and in such manner as the Legislature shall by law prescribe."

Mr. S. said he had understood, before he came here, that local legislation was to be taken from the Legislature and given to the local authorities. The Legislature had expended a vast amount of time on local matters and questions, and he thought it proper they should be transferred to the authorities of the several counties.

Mr. HANSCOM said he was opposed to giving to any local authorities any such power as that contemplated by the amendment. He hoped it would not prevail.

Mr. CRARY thought the amendment had a very broad foundation; it gave exclusive power to the board of supervisors to pass acts under general laws. He believed it was proposed to have general laws on most matters. They wished to send legislation out of these halls, but they should be careful that in restricting the Legislature, and giving legislative power to local boards, they did not create seventy legislatures instead of restricting one. He was in favor of giving the supervisors certain powers, but not to the extent spoken of and proposed by the amendment. He would rather give it to the townships, and let the people come together, as in old Greece, and decide all questions.

Mr. J. CLARK thought there was too much jealousy of the Legislature. Much had been done amiss by that body, but the Convention should not take all power from them—it should be cautious, and not give supervisors too much power. In the way they were proceeding, the Legislature would be too much restricted.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, the Convention adjourned.

REPORTS.

Mr. J. BARTOW, from the committee on the organization of the government of cities and villages, reported

ARTICLE —.

Of Cities and Villages.

Sec. 1. It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages, and to restrict their powers of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and in contracting debts by such corporations.

Sec. 2. All judicial officers of cities and villages shall be elected at such time and in such manner as the Legislature may direct—all other officers of such cities and villages shall be elected by the electors thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose.

Sec. 3. Private property shall not be taken for improvements in cities and villages without the consent of the owner, unless the compensation therefor shall first be determined by a jury of freeholders of such city or village, and actually paid or tendered in the manner to be provided by law.

The article was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole and ordered printed.

Mr. WOODMAN, from the committee on the punishment of crimes, to whom was referred a resolution directing said committee to inquire into the expediency of providing for the abolition of capital punishment, reported

ARTICLE —.

Punishment of Crimes.

"The punishment of death is forever prohibited in this State."

Which was read the first and second time by its title, and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. McCLELLAND gave notice that on to-morrow he would call up the article entitled "Legislative Department."

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. EATON in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment, which was to add at the end of section 8, "and exclusive power to pass acts creating local corporations under general laws, and for such other local purposes, and in such manner as the Legislature shall by law prescribe."

The amendment did not prevail.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD moved to amend section 8 by adding "no organized township shall be divided without the consent of a majority of the electors."

Mr. N. PIERCE would inquire if four townships were organized in one, if it would not prevent a separate organization of any one town, if a large majority was in one town, and chose to vote against it?

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—The object was to prevent any sub-divisions of old and well established township lines in the older and more settled portions of the State. There are in the neighborhood of Jackson many old town lines not bounded by the original survey of the United States. They are six by eight miles, and the object is to prevent them from being sub-divided without their own consent. I am not particular as to the phraseology, but I am satisfied that something of the kind should be done to preserve their rights.

Mr. COOK—The amendment would be construed to give authority to divide the townships, so as to make them the size of the U. S. survey, six miles square.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD understood that the section, as it originally stood, conferred the power; if that was not the fact he would withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK moved to strike out "mill dams."

That was not a local question. Look at the St. Joseph River. If you give authority to build a mill dam at the mouth of that river, you can easily perceive that it is not a local question. There may be a question as to that right, as it is a meandered stream; but whether so or not it is safer to do without it; therefore, I think it should be left to the Legislature.

Mr. FRALICK moved to amend by striking out "and may grant privileges to construct bridges or mill dams, or to lay out roads in their respective counties."

Mr. F. said—I think that it should be stricken out—that it is mischievous in its tendency—gives a great deal of trouble and expense, and will be useless. All the arguments of the gentleman from Kalamazoo will apply as well to these words.

Mr. WOODMAN hoped that the amendment, so far as it related to roads, would not prevail. He considered it perfectly competent for the supervisors to lay out roads, and if that part was insisted upon he should vote against it.

Mr. FRALICK—The power of making roads is in the towns. I have heard no complaints. There is probably not a county road in the State. The roads, when laid out by the towns, become State roads.

Mr. COOK—The supervisors have authority to lay out county roads. The towns have only the power to lay out town roads.

Mr. WALKER—It is well known that for the last seven or eight years we have had numerous applications to the Legislature to pass acts authorizing the erection of mill dams and bridges across streams that are called, but never have been or can be by any possibility made, navigable. Clinton river, for instance, was never navigated by any craft whatever, higher than the village of Frederick, in Macomb county, and yet it is declared to be a navigable stream for twenty or thirty miles higher up.

There will be applications for other dams on other streams. An application is made to a body that knows nothing about the matter, except what they derive from the members of the county. It seems to me that it would be safer to leave this in the power of the local magistrates, who could judge better of the propriety of allowing mill dams to be constructed across each stream, than to leave it to the Legislature. Look at the session laws; the applications are numerous, and have generally been successful. I therefore think it would be a safer and better way to leave it to the supervisors.

Mr. J. BARTOW—I am obliged to differ from my friend from Macomb, and I think the argument of my friend from Kalamazoo conclusive. The streams run through various counties, and the rights of one county might be seriously affected by the action of a local board below or above them, and over whose action they could have no control. Grant this power, that a county, for its own purposes, may dam a river without providing a lock, and all the county above would be deprived of the navigation of the stream. In our county it would be highly injurious—absolutely ruinous to our prosperity. It has been difficult to keep the Legislature from meddling with the navigable streams, and at one session nearly half the time was taken up in quarrelling about a mill dam in our section. To be sure, the question was tested and defeated; but if a board of supervisors could have erected the dam, we should have had no remedy.

Mr. MOORE—I hope that "mill dams" will be stricken out; it will be very singular if a board of supervisors are invested with authority to stop the products of a county from passing on the waters of a navigable stream; but bridges and roads are different things. They are made for affording facilities to the inhabitants. Therefore I think that power might be given. I hope, therefore, that nothing but "mill dams" will be stricken out.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend by in-serting after "mill dams," "across streams not actually navigable."

Mr. W.—There may be an objection with respect to the larger streams, but some that are meandered cannot be made navigable.

Mr. BARTOW—If this has reference to the streams declared so by the Ordinance, it comes in conflict with it. It enables a local board to over-ride every thing—to say this stream is navigable, that stream is not—it would be a dangerous power in their hands.

Mr. CHURCH—I can see no objection to entrusting this power to a board of supervisors. Take a stream that is navigable, neither the Legislature nor the board have power over the stream. Take, for instance, the case of a stream that is meandered and is not navigable, and that there is a necessity for a dam being thrown across the stream; that either public or local interests will be promoted by it, and I would ask, where can power be more safely or more wisely invested than in a board of supervisors?

And if the board should grant permission to build such a dam, they do not thereby injure the rights of any other person; they give a sanction which may be necessary for avoiding litigation, but they cannot give any character to the stream. You preclude no rights that any person holds under the constitution of the United States.

The Legislature must act with much less knowledge of the facts than the supervisors; but whether granted by either, the person so receiving the grant can do little without the sanction of private individuals; and I think that he had better go to a board of supervisors than consume the time of the Legislature unnecessarily.

Mr. CRARY said there seemed so much difference of opinion respecting this section that he moved to strike it out. The twelfth section contained all that was necessary in relation to legislative power being given to a board of Supervisors. He was disposed to give Supervisors power to construct bridges, to organize new townships, in some cases to lay out roads and even other powers not included in the section; but he could not vote to give them the power to grant charters of incorporation for local purposes, even under general laws. While this power was being taken from the Legislature, he could not vote to transfer it to any board of Supervisors. The power of granting privileges to erect mill dams was of doubtful propriety, if these dams were to be erected on our navigable waters. These we had no right to obstruct by granting privileges to individuals. We could improve their navigation, but not obstruct it by authorizing the construction of dams for milling purposes.

He denied that the Ordinance of 1787 was now in force in Michigan. When we became a State of the Union we entered into new relations with the United States. We were admitted upon a footing of equality with the old States, and acquired the same right of sovereignty and jurisdiction over our navigable waters that belongs to the old States. By the act of admission, the jurisdiction of the State is made co-extensive with its limits. The language of the act of admission is that the State shall have "jurisdiction" over every thing within the limits assigned her. This language abrogates every clause in the Ordinance whereby our lakes, rivers and carrying places were made the common highways of the Union. The State stands in all her relations to the Union as one of the old thirteen, except in those cases where she voluntarily agreed by the compact then entered into, to stand in a different relation. By compact she agreed not to interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, and not to tax non-resident lands higher than resident. She however entered into no engagements about the waters of the lakes or of the rivers. And therefore, in respect of these, she is on an equal footing with New York or Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAMS would like to know if it was in order for one member to interfere with private relations of other members. If the assumption of the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] is correct, he feared the gentleman from Berrien, near him, [Mr. BEESON] would claim a reimbursement of a judgment obtained against him by the speaker. The gentleman from Berrien would doubtless be grateful, but he had actually paid a judgment obtained under a decision which rested entirely on the validity of the Ordinance, wherein our own laws were made to succumb and yield to the superior validity and force of the Ordinance of 1787.

Mr. CRARY—If the courts come to that decision, it is not my decision.

Mr. WHIPPLE—There is a case which was fully discussed and elaborately examined, and by turning to it, the Convention will ascertain the doctrine as laid down by the court with regard to the Ordinance. I think the case should be examined, for it is admitted that it conveys an exact exposition of the law upon the subject.

Mr. CORNELL—I am surprised at the course the discussion has taken. The Legislature can grant but little; the supervisors can give no more. It merely intends that the question shall be brought nearer to the people. The grants cannot take away private rights; it is simply to bring the question where the grant can be rightly judged of, because known; as many cases have proved highly injurious where mill dams have been erected.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I rise, not for the purpose of inflicting a speech upon the committee, but to propound one or two queries to the chairman of the committee reporting this bill. I desire to know whether the object is to give to the board of supervisors the exclusive right to organize new townships; or whether the intention is to give the power also to the Legislature? If the former, then the language used will not admit of such construction. The expression, "the board of supervisors shall have the power to organize new townships," does not take the power from the Legislature. My wish is to give it to one or the other, exclusively; and hence my former motion. It should be confided to the board of supervisors, because they are the most competent to discharge the duties. Every one will see the impropriety of submitting it to both, because then there will be a constant appealing from the judgment and decision of one to the other. If the section is not amended, I shall vote to strike out; but if the power is given exclusively to the board of supervisors, I will vote to retain it.

In relation to the question mooted, about bridging navigable streams, &c., I would ask my friend from Berrien, what are the principles involved in the case of the Wheeling suspension bridge over the Ohio river; and whether the decision of the Supreme Court, already strongly intimated, will not in all probability give us such a basis as we desire, upon which to establish the claim for which most of us contend. As I understand the matter, the only doubt in the minds of that court is, whether the bridge is an obstruction to the navigation of that river; and Chancellor Walworth has been appointed to ascertain that fact.

Mr. CHURCH—I agree with the gentleman from Monroe, that the power should be possessed by one body exclusively; and I believe that it should be possessed by the board of supervisors. I opposed the amendment, yesterday, because it gave them authority to divide townships. If he will leave out that portion, and by any phraseology give the board power to construct mill dams, roads and bridges, I shall vote for it, as I am convinced that it will be more proper that they should possess that power rather than the Legislature. We give them nothing that can conflict with individual rights.

Mr. S. CLARK—There are two questions to be considered—expediency and right. First, as to its expediency: It strikes me that it cannot with as much propriety be confided to a board of supervisors as to the Legislature. It is a very important question; and this is a local board to whom you propose to entrust it. It acts for the county, and for the county alone. Does it follow as a matter of course, that the interests of one county are identical with those of the county above or below it? No sir; they conflict. They have conflicted in the case that has been mentioned, in which I was counsel. The gentleman prosecuted the matter on account of a lock's giving way. His flour was destroyed, and he had to resort to law.

The interests of the counties conflict, and the power should not be placed in the hands of one. The erection of a dam might benefit one, while it seriously impeded another county. It should be left for the action of the Legislature.

Secondly, as to our rights. The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] contends that the Ordinance has been over-ridden. In answer, it is enough to refer to the decisions of the courts of law.

In my own practice, the Ordinance has always been held valid. If the river is obstructed, we get the obstruction removed as a nuisance, except when a lock is put up. In Indiana the same thing has been held. There it was held that the dam was properly erected because a lock was built, and that instead of being an obstruction it improved the navigation. And if the gentleman will examine the case, he will find that was the ground taken.

I do not object to the board of supervisors as a body; they are probably composed of intelligent men, but they are a local board, and should act for local purposes.

Mr. BACKUS—I should be sorry, Mr. Chairman, to see that part of the section that relates to the division and organization of towns struck out, as is now proposed, for it contains within itself wholesome provisions for local legislation, which had better be done at home than abroad; I mean with regard to the organization of towns within your counties.

The difficulties which have been suggested may be obviated by confining the operation to such counties as have been organized; and I think that the division and organization of townships can be left with greater safety and more justice to their board at home, rather than to a legislative body. For one, I shall be glad to vote for any provision that shall be conclusive and exclusive—precluding the Legislature from interfering in the division or organization of townships.

As far as relates to the other provision, it contains matters that are at least dangerous to commit to the care of a local board—the power to grant privileges to construct bridges or mill dams. Let either hypothesis that has been maintained be correct—whether the waters are or are not under the entire power or sovereignty of the State—it is of the greatest importance, as the powers given to the local board are the highest that can be exercised. A river originates in a remote county, and runs through various counties—can we safely permit the control of that river to be exercised by one county?

Something has been said about the Ordinance; and gentlemen, to obviate the difficulty, have proposed an amendment of this character: to insert “waters navigable in fact.” Navigable for what, sir? A Seventy-Four, or a bark canoe? The constituents of my friend from Mackinaw transport their commerce in bark canoes; and their rights are as inviolable as those of any others; so that the amendment would obviate no difficulties, even if it designated the class of vessels. The rights of the humblest citizen to transport his commerce in the smallest bark canoe is just as sacred and as inviolable as if he employed the largest class of vessels.

If the Ordinance was within our control, and by us repealable, or if it had now no force, and the adjudication of the courts recognized the exclusive and complete sovereignty of the State over the waters designated as navigable in the Ordinance, we ought still to hesitate long before giving this power proposed to a local board. But, even our own courts hold that the Ordinance is only revoked so far as its provisions conflict with the provisions of the State constitution; in other words, the adoption of a constitution with provisions repugnant to the provisions of the Ordinance, and the sanction of such constitution by Congress, forms the common consent contemplated by the Ordinance necessary for its repeal. Then, and then only, it is revoked. Until this common consent is obtained, the provisions of the Ordinance are of binding force upon the district of territory, and the State formed out of it. It is the law binding and limiting the power and rights both of the citizens of the State and United States. This principle was clearly shown and enforced in a case which elicited much talent and research. I allude to the case of McConnel vs. Spooner; in which the U. S. Circuit Court said that it was competent to lock or dam a river and improve it, but not to obstruct it.

If gentlemen will turn to adjudications in the State of Ohio, they will find that the decision of our own courts; in the case on the St. Joseph river, has followed and enforced the same principle. The decisions in Indiana enforce this construction as well as Ohio, and the question arose upon the force and validity of the Ordinance. At the places where the questions have arisen, the streams were not navigable for the smallest class of schooners, but they were boatable.

What is the rule of the Ordinance? That the waters shall be free only to the citizens of Michigan? No sir: but to the citizens of all the Union. Can Congress revoke this? No sir; and yet you propose to commit it to the action of 30 or 40 legislative bodies sitting in the various counties, to wit: the boards of supervisors. The courts of Indiana have ruled and held the proposition as broad as this: that it is incompetent for the Legislature to grant a power to construct a dam across waters that are navigable. If gentlemen dwell upon technicalities, there is not in the N. W. Territory one inch of navigable waters, according to the maritime law of England and the admiralty jurisdiction; for that means where there is an ebb and flow of the tide, with which we are unacquainted. What does it mean then with reference to these streams? It means that if the streams afford carrying places for our produce, that are boatable, they shall not be subjected to the interference of any local authorities obstructing it.

The Ordinance of 1787 is common to all the States, and covers the whole extent of the North West Territory. It vests in all the citizens certain rights; and secures those rights to all. Common consent can revoke it; and if the Constitution comes in conflict with it, it is revoked; if not, it is still operative. I consider it a power that is dangerous to commit to the boards of supervisors, to say that they may obstruct the free navigation of the waters. You cannot give the power. I should wish to see the right kept sacred, and guaranteed in the Bill of Rights.

I think that the provision relating to roads should be given to the towns as far as we can. They have a more immediate knowledge—they are more capable of judging of the public necessities, and of the necessity of public highways. With regard to the power of dividing the towns, I think that if gentlemen look at it they will see that it has cost the State a great deal, and that the power can with equal safety be committed to the board of supervisors.

Mr. WHIPPLE—There are, Mr. Chairman, questions of considerable delicacy involved in this discussion; it is important, therefore, that the Convention should deliberate long before granting the power to the supervisors contemplated by the section under consideration.

That part of the Ordinance of 1787 having a direct bearing upon the clause proposed to be stricken out, is found in the fourth of the articles of compact, and is in these words: "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, impost or duty therefor." Now, sir, these articles of compact "between the original States and the people and States in the said territory," are declared to be "unalterable, unless by common consent." It is quite manifest, then, that these articles are of binding force, unless they have been repealed by consent of the parties to them. I am not aware that either party to the compact have ever given their consent to the abrogation of the clause in question; if not, it is obligatory on the people of this State to preserve it inviolate.

Would it, then, be safe to delegate to the several boards of supervisors the power to authorize obstructions in the navigable rivers of this State? I think, sir, it would be hazardous to confer such a power. Its exercise involves questions of a character too complicated and intricate to be safely lodged in a tribunal constituted as our boards of supervisors are. The interests, not only of our immediate constituents, but of the people of the United States, are to be protected. Whether, in a given case, an authority to obstruct one of our navigable rivers, is justified by the Ordinance, presents a judicial question, the determination of which should be submitted to the judicial tribunals of the State, and not to a tribunal whose competency to pronounce an enlightened judgment upon the various and complex legal points that might arise, may be well questioned.

I am willing to confer upon the boards of supervisors of the several counties such powers of legislation as may be deemed proper and safe; but I cannot consent to invest them with authority to legislate upon a subject not involving interests of a local character, but which affect, vitally, the rights and interests, not only of the people of this State, but of the United States.

Mr. CRARY here interposed, and said if he rightly understood the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] the original States must first give their consent before the articles of compact could be abrogated.

Mr. WHIPPLE, in reply, said that he must have been misapprehended by the gentleman from Calhoun. That misapprehension arose, probably, from the circumstance that in submitting his remarks, he had quoted from the Ordinance, which declared the five fundamental articles to be articles of compact between the original States and the people of the North West Territory. It is to be remembered that the Ordinance was adopted several years before the Constitution of the United States, and it had been held by high judicial authority that the consent of the Congress of the United States, instead of the consent of the original States, was necessary in order to repeal any of the articles of compact. The manner by which such repeal may be effected, is illustrated by the admission into the Union of the several States carved out of the North West Territory. The people, by virtue of the rights secured by the fifth article, formed constitutions, which being presented to Congress and found to be republican, those States were admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. If any provisions of these several constitutions conflict with those of the Ordinance, the latter has been considered so far abrogated; the common consent required by the Ordinance being clearly implied, from the fact that the people of those States, one of the parties to the compact, in the most solemn form, propose an alteration, which is assented to by the other party, by accepting their constitution and admitting the States so formed into the Union.

Mr. CRARY admitted there may have been decisions of the character alluded to by the delegate from Berrien, [Mr. WHIPPLE,] but they were not applicable to the State of Michigan. They might apply to the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, because those States were, by the acts authorizing them to become States, compelled to form their constitutions so that they should not be repugnant to the Ordinance of 1787. No such rule was prescribed to the State of Michigan. She formed her Constitution without the express authority of Congress. The boundaries were prescribed by the act admitting her into the Union, and that act says that she "shall have jurisdiction" over the territory mentioned in the act. There is no qualification of this jurisdiction—no reservation in respect to the waters of the lakes, or the navigable rivers, and no compact in regard to either.

The Ordinance of 1787 had been made to serve many purposes of late. All kinds of construction had been put upon it by both courts and politicians. In its day, that Ordinance had performed good service, but it was when we were a territory; but, now that we were a State of the Union, admitted in every respect on a footing with the old States, it had ceased to be of binding obligation in Michigan. It might have force in Ohio, by reason of the language of the act authorizing that State to form a constitutional government; but even this he did not believe.

The navigable waters of Michigan are put upon the same footing as those of Massachusetts and New York. The Supreme court of the United States have decided in a case coming before them from Alabama, "that the new States have the same rights, jurisdiction and sovereignty over navigable waters and the soil under them as the original States." This case came from a State that, on its admission into the Union, entered into a compact with the United States, that the navigable waters within the State should be common highways for the whole Union. If, then, Alabama has such power, what must be that of Michigan, where no such compact exists? He claimed for Michigan the jurisdiction over her navigable waters to the same extent that it was claimed and exercised by the old thirteen States. What was and what was not navigable was a question of fact, to be decided as cases might arise, as they had been decided in Pennsylvania. There it has been decided that if a river be navigable, it belongs to the State, and becomes a public highway for every body to pass over. It is not necessary that the tide should ebb and flow in a river to give the public a right to pass over it. If it be navigable, the public have an easement upon its waters.

In Michigan, many of the streams and the lakes had been meandered by the general government in their survey of the public lands. Over them the jurisdiction of the United States had passed to this State. Our rights over them as a State were the same as the rights of the old States over their waters, similarly situated. Not one of the principles of the Ordinance of 1787 could control the State in relation to them. If it was in force in regard to the navigable waters, it must also be in force over the carrying places between the same; and if in force over the carrying places, then no toll could be taken on a canal around the Saut St. Mary, or the Rapids in the Grand River. The State, in granting a charter for a canal around the Saut, authorizing tolls, had exceeded her jurisdiction—had violated the Ordinance.

The waters of our great lakes, and the navigable waters running into them, were common highways, not by virtue of any ordinance, but by the principles of the common law of the whole country, which makes "all navigable waters public property, for the use of all the citizens." The State may improve them or authorize their improvement; but she can neither obstruct them nor authorize their obstruction.

The question has been asked, how do the United States have jurisdiction on the lakes? The answer is that she had none, until an act of Congress was passed on the subject. The Supreme Court of the United States, long ago, decided that they had no admiralty jurisdiction over the waters of the Mississippi; but at the same time intimated that Congress might give it to them. On the lakes, Congress has attempted to give it, but with such qualifications as cannot be found in any act pertaining to the waters of the Atlantic, where the tide ebbs and flows. The act shows that Congress legislated more with reference to the power to regulate commerce, than to that clause in the constitution of the United States giving to the federal courts admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. If the federal courts have this jurisdiction over western waters, it is an incidental power, arising out of the power to regulate commerce, and attaches itself to our navigable waters, by virtue of a law common to all the States.

Mr. WHIPPLE—I do not intend to discuss at length the questions suggested by the delegate from Calhoun, as they are entirely foreign to the subject under consideration. I shall, therefore, confine my remarks to a correction of what I deem to be manifest errors in the speech to which we have just listened.

The maritime jurisdiction now exercised by the District Court of the United States, is derived from an act of Congress. It had been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by the Supreme Court of this State, that the maritime law was inapplicable to the great lakes. These decisions, and the vast increase of commerce upon the western waters, induced Congress to extend the principles of the maritime law to certain cases; and to this end, the District Courts of the United States in the western States were armed with the necessary powers to effectuate this object.

In his argument upon the jurisdiction which this State claims over its navigable rivers, the delegate from Calhoun asks with much emphasis, by what authority Congress interfered with the Hudson river. Without embarrassing the question before us by a discussion of the nature and extent of the jurisdiction which this State may lawfully claim over the rivers within its limits, I desire to answer the question propounded by the gentleman, by saying that the source of authority for removing obstructions in the Hudson river, is not to be found in any notion that the United States possesses jurisdiction over that river, but in that article of the Constitution by which Congress is authorized "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States." Under this general grant of power, Congress has, from time to time, made large appropriations for the improvement of the navigation, not only of the Hudson, but of the Mississippi and other rivers.

Mr. BUSH—This discussion may be useful, but it strikes me that it has gone far beyond the present question.

It is well known that at almost every session the Legislature has granted permission to build dams. If the Legislature had not the power, the persons so applying ran the risk of it. The question is, which of the two bodies are the most fit and proper to grant the privilege. I think the board of supervisors the most proper. If the Legislature has not the power, neither has the board; and that risk must be run by the person applying. I believe that the board will be the most competent to judge of the propriety of the application.

Mr. BACKUS—Mr. Chairman, my friend from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] is wise beyond what is written; and it does not seem a wisdom derived from the sources of knowledge by which we obtain information as to the measure of our rights as citizens or States.

Whatever the judicial tribunals have determined with reference to the construction of the fundamental laws of the land, is the rule of action; but the gentleman seems to resolve everything into first principles; his arguments are founded in the abstract, without reference to the rule as recognized by our government. I admit that this discussion did not necessarily involve all these considerations, nor should I at this time have arisen, but for a misunderstanding of what I said as to the limit of the Ordinance and the influence it exerts upon the people of this State as a part of the North West Territory. It is irrepealable, imperishable and binding for all time to come, except as it is revoked by common consent.

The gentleman has told us about the old thirteen States, and the other five States in the North West Territory. What may be his notions in relation to the common consent, I am unable to state. His ideas are correct with regard to the admiralty jurisdiction, but he wonders how the government came to improve the Hudson river. I answer from the power in relation to commerce, and because that jurisdiction extends where the tide ebbs and flows; and also it comes within the scope of their powers as to Indian countries; that would give them the right.

But the question whether the rivers of this country are under our control, depends upon the question whether the Ordinance is of binding effect. And I do not wish to see committed to the board of supervisors a pretended power, which a regularly constituted judicial tribunal says we have not, and beyond the bounds that the judiciary has finally fixed as the limit of the power. I did not expect to be obliged to go into this lengthy discussion, but it is a matter of considerable importance.

The judicial tribunals of the country, the supreme courts, the local courts, exercise a power that will control your right, and my right; we must all yield to the constitutional exercise of judicial power; it is the law of the land—it is the rule of action—it is the law that controls property.

Mr. CRARY (interposing)—Suppose we abolish courts?

Mr. BACKUS—Well, suppose we do? Courts have existed, and we must rely upon what they have done as the rule of right, if so absurd a proposition can be supposed. Why purport to give power which may bring us in conflict with the organic law, or against great and well settled principles, equal at least to our own constitution. The rule I take to be this: so far as the constitution of any State conflicts with the provisions of the Ordinance, to that extent the Ordinance is revoked, when approved by Congress. By common consent is meant the consent of the State by its people and Congress. Until that time, the rights under the Ordinance are vested in the citizens of all the States; and the citizens of this State, neither in their individual or aggregate capacity, have a right to interfere with it. I have no right to obstruct a highway; no more has a sovereign State, if it interferes with the rights of the citizens of all the States. That is the rule. And that it is the rule, I appeal to the judicial tribunals. When the gentleman says that this is not right, and if the courts give that opinion, it is not his opinion, it amounts to nothing. The question is, is it the rule that governs us? You cannot depart from it. You may make a provision and commit it to the board of supervisors, or the Legislature, and if the matter was brought to the test of a judicial interpretation, it might be decided that you had granted a power that it was incompetent for you to exercise. Congress has mended the streams. They had a right to do it—they are parties to the instrument.

The gentleman from Monroe asks how the people of the United States could make a contract with the old confederacy, which made it binding upon the people under the present constitution of the United States? This was the exercise of a power that originated with the whole of our republican government. They had the power. The legislative council called the people together to take the steps for our organization as a State; and the only question that Congress could entertain was—was the constitution republican? And if republican, and was adopted by Congress, common consent was given. If the gentleman from Calhoun was as familiar with his books as he is with speech making, he would find that the rule controls him and me, and all the citizens of the State. The common consent is the consent of the State, organized from the territory under the Ordinance, and the people of the United States, through their organized governments.

The State Constitution and Judicial Decisions have limited the effect of these words; but by what remains we are bound. What has been decided?—that the people of the United States, residing in that portion of territory contemplated by the Ordinance, organizing a government which is republican, and making a provision that conflicts with the Ordinance in their constitution, which constitution must be accepted by the Congress of the United States—to that extent is the Ordinance revoked.

Otherwise you have no protection for the citizens of other States. It was a citizen of Massachusetts that asserted his rights in the case of McConnel vs. Spooner, et al. The court said he had rights, but they were not impaired. The same question is involved in the case of the Suspension Bridge at Wheeling; and I doubt not that the same results will follow when the facts are ascertained, as it has been intimated that the main question was, “does it impair the navigation of the Ohio?” The question before us is, however, whether we shall delegate this right to 40 or 50 bodies sitting in various counties of the State; and I would ask, can it safely be trusted to them. I think not, and I hope that the Convention will not sustain the proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS disagreed with gentlemen as to the importance of this discussion, rambling as it had been. Many truths had been forcibly impressed on his mind, and no truth more pungently, than that the navigability of our rivers should have been kept inviolable by a provision of the Bill of Rights.

When the ordinance was passed, it seems, there were certain vital common law rights, certain great principles, which the framers of the Ordinance determined should be secured to the future inhabitants of these North-Western States, against all contingencies—even kept sacred against the acts of the people themselves. Among these, the great common law right in regard to the navigability of rivers, was secured by the following clause: “The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory, as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the confederacy without any tax, impost, or duty therefor.” Thus was this great right, this great privilege, secured. When the Bill of Rights was under discussion, he was on the point of offering a provision embracing substantially this clause. We had now incorporated in the Bill of Rights many of the ideas and, he believed, some of the language of the Ordinance. He did not do it. But since he had listened to the assertions of the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. CARY,] assuming the futility of the Ordinance; and when he reflected that he had seen the property of his constituents wasted and scattered by thousands and tens of thousands, in consequence of illegal obstructions, from one end to the other of the navigable river on which they reside, and feeling as a citizen thus situated necessarily must, he now regretted that he had not before asked the adoption of the principle in question in the constitution.

He had noticed the connection of the words “mill dams,” in the section under discussion. He regarded it as so much verbiage. He thought of moving to strike it out, but on further reflection, deemed it of too little importance even to make that motion. And why? It is futile so far as it could affect navigable rivers. It can neither be in the power of supervisors nor Legislatures, nor even of this Convention, to impair a single right to the unimpeded use of the river. As one citizen, living on the banks of the St. Joseph, he would not care the snap of his finger whether you confided or not the power over mill dams to supervisors. He had the best evidence in the world that he need not. He had obtained judgment on the validity of the Ordinance, under a clear, distinct, emphatic charge of the Chief Justice, that the Ordinance was paramount and supreme. This decision was only confirmatory of decisions in Ohio, Indiana, and the United States Circuit Courts. At the trial in question, the act of the Michigan Legislature authorizing the erection of the dam laid upon the table; but the opposing counsel did not even adduce it, knowing it was of no more force than blank paper. He did not believe that any intelligent counsel would set up as defence in a similar case, any act of our future Legislatures, though authorized by the constitution which this Convention frames; much less would he set up an act of the supervisors.

As one individual, he should prefer that the supervisors encroach on his rights as a citizen, rather than any other power or person should do it. If damaged, he would look personally to the most responsible, independent and honest of the board of supervisors for redress, instead, perhaps, of resorting to an irresponsible and dishonest defendant.

He would go farther, and say that the mill-dam legislation of which the evidence was scattered through our statutes, year after year, was all wholly idle, futile, useless, when affecting navigable streams. It was powder lost, time utterly wasted.

Whether a mill dam was authorized by the Legislature or not, it could not be legalized if on a navigable river; and if so erected, it was in defiance of a superior law. If a dam was needed above where a river was navigable, the riparian proprietors need have little occasion to resort to the Legislature. They could erect their own dams on their own domains, at their own peril.

Akin to this was another subject to which he would allude. The discussion had taken a wide range, and he must be pardoned. The relative rights of the future inhabitants of this State to waters navigable and waters not navigable, was of vast and incalculable importance. While on the one hand he would keep forever the great natural channels free, unimpeded, common highways, free as the God of Nature had made and the Ordinance of '87 had maintained them—he would, on the other hand, regulate the terms on which waters should be used above where they were navigable. The gentleman from Kent, [Mr. CHURCH,] the chairman of the committee to which the subject was referred, would, he trusted, introduce a provision which should regulate this matter also. The rights of flowing unimproved and often valueless lands should be regulated in the Constitution. For himself he would allow no one man to usurp and hold, after all damages were provided, any small part of God's creation, to the detriment of the whole people. This Convention will forget and abandon its duty, if it neglects to determine constitutionally the relative rights not only of the present generation, but of posterity, on these great subjects. Vast and incalculable mischief has already arisen. Let us anticipate and prevent similar mischiefs for the future. But one-tenth of our territory is settled. Let the future occupants of all the unsettled portions of the State have their rights and duties secured and determined in advance. Our population may some day be millions, ten times as large as now. Our duty to them requires action.

On these accounts he had watched the discussion with interest. He deemed it a profitable one. There was no better time than now for such a discussion.

One word for his friend from Calhoun, [Mr. CRARY.] Since he [Mr. C.] had assumed such latitudinarian doctrines, he hoped he would excuse him if he should offer and urge a provision for rendering sacred the great common highways of navigable rivers. The gentleman from Calhoun might become a judge of the Supreme Court; and if the rights of his constituents were to be subject to his [Mr. C's] decisions, he should like to place restrictions on him in advance; especially as every bushel of wheat of every farmer in the county of St. Joseph might be affected several cents per bushel by his being debarred from the use of the St. Joseph river.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WALKER, and lost. The question was next taken on the motion of Mr. S. CLARK, to strike out "or mill dams," which was carried.

The question recurring on Mr. FRALICK's amendment,

On motion of Mr. COOK, the words "grant privileges to construct," were stricken out of section 8, and "authorizing the construction of," inserted.

The question then recurring upon Mr.

FRALICK's amendment, the committee refused to strike out.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, section 8 was amended so that the first clause would read as follows: "The board of supervisors of all organized counties shall have the exclusive power to organize new townships."

Mr. BRITAIN offered the following as a substitute for section 8:

"The board of supervisors shall have power to lay out county roads, authorize and provide for the construction of bridges, and may change the boundaries of townships in their respective counties; but no such change shall take effect until approved by a majority of the votes cast upon that subject by the electors of each of the townships effected by the change, in such manner as shall be provided by the Legislature. The Legislature shall, by general laws, provide for the organization of any United States surveyed townships by the inhabitants thereof, whenever said township shall contain —— inhabitants; provided the township from which said township separates, shall contain —— inhabitants; and for the organization of any legally established counties by the inhabitants thereof, whenever said county shall contain —— inhabitants, provided the county from which it separates shall contain —— inhabitants."

Mr. WILLARD moved that the committee rise; which did not prevail.

Mr. FRALICK moved to insert after "counties," in 2d line, "but the expense of laying out, constructing, and the right of way of said roads shall in all cases be paid by the township in which said roads are laid out or constructed."

Which was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. EATON in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of "Article —, County Officers and County Government."

The question being upon Mr. BRITAIN's substitute for section 8,

Mr. HANSCOM inquired if a substitute for the section was in order.

The CHAIR said that there was a proposition to substitute before the committee, therefore it was not in order.

Mr. HANSCOM—I have not participated in this discussion, but it occurs to me that the true place for this will be the Legislative Department; and at this stage of the proceedings I should like to get rid of the whole section, and then place in the Legislative Department something like the following substitute:

"The Legislature shall by general laws provide for the organization and division of townships and counties; for the construction of bridges and laying out of roads, and the erection of mill dams."

I am willing to trust to the wisdom of the Legislature to determine how the general laws shall be framed—whether they will confer it upon the persons who wish to make this organization, or to a local board. The effect of this section will be that, instead of the Legislature, we propose to set every county board legislating all over the State. While we are endeavoring to reduce expense we shall increase it to an alarming degree; and I believe that a simple proposition may be made to enable townships to organize, bridges to be made and mill dams erected, without the intervention of a county board. There may be danger if we make it imperative upon the county boards to accomplish these measures. They may be found to be not the proper tribunals.

I wish to get rid of the section, as I think the Legislative Department the proper article in which it ought to be placed.

Mr. BRITAIN—I entertained the same view as the gentleman from Oakland, but it occurred to me that there was a difficulty in getting it placed in the Legislative Department, as it was not before us, and that, by the amendment, it would be competent for the committee of revision to take it out of this article and insert it in that of the Legislative Department.

Mr. J. CLARK—The Legislative Department will be before us to-morrow.

Mr. BRITAIN—I was aware of that; but if you give the power to the board of supervisors to-day, it will be unlikely that you would give the power to the Legislature to-morrow; and to do so would be a waste of time.

The vote being taken, the motion to substitute was lost.

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out section 8, and insert the substitute he had offered.

Mr. EASTMAN moved to add to the substitute, "and for the removal of county sites."

The motion was lost.

Mr. CORNELL—The Legislature have the power now. Suppose we say they shall do it, and they don't; how shall we reach them? I know of no tribunal that can arraign them, except the ballot box. We may restrain, but we cannot compel them. Ever since the organization of the government, they have had the power and have not done it.

Mr. COOK moved to strike out of the substitute the words "and division." The committee refused to strike out.

The question was then taken on striking out the section, and the committee refused to strike out; so the substitute was lost.

Mr. CROUSE moved to add to section 8 as follows: "Whenever any board of supervisors shall have organized any new township, they shall cause to be filed a certificate of the fact, together with the name and boundaries of the same, in the office of the Secretary of State."

Which was lost.

Section 9 was read.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to strike out "two thirds," and insert "a majority." Motion lost.

Mr. McLEOD moved to strike out section 9. Lost.

Sec. 10. The board of supervisors of any county may borrow or raise by tax _____ dollars, for constructing or repairing public buildings, highways or bridges; but no greater sum shall be borrowed or raised by tax for such purpose, in any one year, unless authorized by the vote of a majority of the electors of said county.

Mr. FRALICK offered the following substitute for section 10:

"Each board of supervisors may borrow when necessary for the erection of public buildings of the county, or the building of bridges therein, any sum of money not exceeding fifteen thousand dollars in all, or may raise the same by a tax; but no board of supervisors shall borrow or raise by a tax for such purposes more than two thousand dollars in any one year, unless authorized by a vote of the majority of the electors of the county, as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. BUSH moved to strike out "borrow or," in first line of section 10.

Mr. B. said—if the board of supervisors are compelled to levy a tax to raise the money, they will be economical; but counties sometimes borrow money which they are unable to pay, and thus they burden the future. Any county that is old enough to build county buildings can raise it by taxation; but by borrowing they are or may be wasteful.

Mr. CHURCH—I apprehend that by the section some emergency must have been contemplated; for instance the building of a bridge. In my own county we have one of the largest bridges in the State: it was a work of State munificence, but now properly belongs to the county. All its repairs are made by the county, and we have once or twice been in danger of losing it by the floods and the ice. Should it be taken away, the amount of business is such that it must immediately be replaced by another. If the money has to be raised by a tax, it might embarrass the action of the board; and this may be true of all the counties—some sudden emergency may arise in each.

It is, I admit, a dangerous power to permit a board of supervisors to contract a loan, and therefore it is just and necessary that there should be a limit. I would therefore wish to see inserted "or by some other means," if the word "borrow" is stricken out, because it follows in the same section, that no greater sum shall be raised except by vote of the people. The section should give them power to raise a certain sum, I care not how much at once, and a larger sum, if the people approve the object; but I do not wish to see stricken out the word "borrow."

The motion was lost.

Mr. MOORE moved to fill the blank with "5000;" which was not agreed to.

Mr. RIX ROBINSON moved to fill the blank with "2000;" which was negatived.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON, the blank was filled with "1000."

Mr. HASCALL moved to strike out "of," where it last occurs in last line of section 10, and insert "voting therefor in."

Which was disagreed to.

The question then recurring upon the substitute of Mr. FRALICK, and a division of the question being called for,

Mr. FRALICK said—This defines the amount of debt, and is, I think, preferable to the section. I hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. TIFFANY—The same objection exists to the substitute as to the section—it is impossible to tell whether two-thirds or one-third have voted upon the question. The borrowing is authorized by a majority of electors in the county. It does not say a majority of those who have voted. There is no means of telling: the language requires that a majority of all the electors of the county must have voted, and that fact cannot be well ascertained.

The substitute was lost.

Sec. 11. The board of supervisors shall fix and define the compensation of the various county officers in their respective counties, and the sum so fixed and defined shall be subject to no alteration by appeal or otherwise.

Mr. McLEOD moved to strike out all after "counties" of section 11.

Mr. CHAPEL—It has been the general practice of the Prosecuting Attorney and others to appeal, and the Judge has generally allowed more or less. We do not henceforth want an appeal from the people to a Judge who is independent of that people. The board of supervisors are the immediate representatives of the whole people of the county. If a person takes an office, he ought to be satisfied with the compensation without making an appeal. There is not a Prosecuting Attorney who does not take an appeal to get a larger salary. I have been familiar with this kind of thing myself.

Mr. CHURCH—Does the honorable gentleman mean to say that he has taken appeals?

Mr. CHAPEL—No sir, I have not; but I know it will hurt the prosecuting attorneys to deprive them of the right to appeal.

Mr. McLEOD—If it were not contrary to parliamentary usage, I should use strong language in reply to the gentleman from Macomb. His statement is, however, incorrect. There is a great deal of humbug in the attempt to fix a reproach upon lawyers. For my own part, I can testify that my salary as prosecuting attorney is merely nominal. I have taken no appeal; and I have sacrificed from $1,000 to $1,500 that I might have made by managing the cases for the defence. I know that, in deference to my duty, I have sacrificed my own interests and feelings; and I am surprised that the gentleman from Macomb should make such statements. I do not like to see this jealous feeling endeavored to be raised, as we can all turn round and abuse one another. I think that part should be stricken out, to prevent injustice being done by the board of supervisors. If they act unjustly, there should be an appeal from their decision.

Mr. MORRISON—The gentleman from Macomb says the judges are not responsible to the people. We propose to elect them; therefore they will be responsible; and the board of supervisors can alter the rates of compensation during the time the officers are serving; while in that case the person who was guaranteed a certain amount would have no appeal. I am in favor of giving the board as much power as they ought to have; but, as the judges will be responsible, I am in favor of striking out.

Mr. TIFFANY—I conceive that the boards of supervisors generally give a fair compensation, but there are times when they do not. You require that all the county officers shall keep their offices at the county seat. If they live in any part of the county, they must remove and live at the county seat; and they must, by the section as it stands, take what compensation the board of supervisors choose to give them. This is unjust. There is no injustice in leaving it to a tribunal after it has been fixed by a board of supervisors. If they give a proper sum, the party will be contented; if they do not, he should have an opportunity of securing a just reward for his services.

Mr. BUSH—When gentlemen take into consideration the fact that all the officers will be elected by the people, that the candidates are well acquainted with the county, its character for liberality and the duties required, no great hardships or inconvenience can be experienced if the board of supervisors are allowed to fix the salary without appeal.

I have been a looker on for some time, in the State; I have seen accounts presented that were manifestly unjust. I have seen them perfectly satisfied when their accounts were cut down twenty-five or thirty per cent. I have seen others dissatisfied, and take an appeal, and generally that appeal has been successful, at one time or other. When offices go begging in the counties it will be time enough to talk of appeals.

Mr. BEARDSLEY—I think it proper to keep this section as it is, for if I am correctly informed, there has scarcely ever been an appeal, without that appeal having been allowed. If a person is not willing to receive what the people are willing to give, let him remain at home as a private individual. It is unjust that he should accept an office and present an extravagant bill, and have the means of enforcing that by an appeal.

Mr. FRALICK—I do not think that the board should fix the compensation of the register of deeds or that of the county clerk, but that the compensation for those offices should be uniform throughout the State.

I am opposed to allowing any chance of appeals, and I will state the reasons, with all due deference to the bench. There have been numerous wrongs inflicted upon the people of this State by these appeals. It has cost the county of Wayne from 3,000 to $5,000, and thereby justice has not been rendered to the people. There have been numerous expressions of the peoples' wishes, and the boards have endeavored to keep within reasonable limits, but it has been of no avail.

I have had the honor of being an auditor in the county of Wayne for three years I labored hard to do what was right, but found it impossible. We appointed a prosecuting attorney, with a salary of $800; and thirty attorneys would have been glad to have given bonds to perform the duties of the office for that sum. We told the person that this was his salary, and he would have no more. What was the consequence? He brought in a larger account; the board refused to audit it. He got a mandamus, and we procured counsel to argue the case in the Supreme Court. We found that there was a power behind the throne—the board was defeated; and we are now paying nearer $1,200 than $800.

In the winter of 1837 I brought in a bill to this effect—to cut off the power of appeal. It passed through the House, and was lost in the Senate by the influence of interested men. I believe the people are competent to fix the salaries of their officers; and I believe that it is right that the person should have his salary undiminished during the term for which he is appointed. He knows his duty—he knows his salary—and if extra duty is at any time performed, the board are always willing to allow a reasonable claim.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Gentlemen seem to imagine there is something very pure about the boards of supervisors of Michigan. They are but fallible men. They may do a great wrong, and if so, should there not be a remedy?

I might work for a certain time for the gentleman from Wayne, and he might give me what he thought proper and right; but does the law say that I shall abide by his arbitrary rules. No sir; it gives me a right to go into a court of justice, and prefer my claim.

This is the question—if the board of supervisors inflict a wrong shall we not have a remedy? Now I venture to say that there is not a gentleman in this Convention who, if he had a case in a justice's court which he thought was wrongfully decided, but would be glad of the privilege of an appeal. The gentleman from Wayne may have a case, even now, in which thousands are depending; a case of an appeal. Should he not go to the Supreme Court and have the highest tribunal of the land settle the question?

A singular argument has been used; that all appeals have been sustained by the courts. If that is the case, what does it prove? That the boards of supervisors, instead of being the pure, infallible men they have been represented, are very liable to be wrong. Sir, your judges are men to whom you are willing to entrust your dearest rights—they try citizens on the charge of murder and treason—they decide on property to an immense amount; yet you are unwilling to trust them with the paltry charges of a constable's fees. I would appeal if we cannot draw a conclusion, that if appeals are always successful, the boards of supervisors are generally wrong. I believe in the county of Macomb there has been but one appeal by a Prosecuting Attorney, and that was a person who lives in the gentleman's own town, and was not successful. Some appeals have been taken by the County Clerks, some by Constables, some by the Sheriff, and only in three cases that were manifestly just. Some were allowed, some were not.

But a trial on an appeal is the same as any other trial. It is not taken by ex parte evidence; both sides are heard, and the judge is bound to decide according to law. And if so, is there any injustice in the procedure? The county clerk, register of deeds, and judge of probate should have a uniform salary all over the State. But I am in favor of striking out that portion that relates to appeal, as it is a principle that we do not apply elsewhere.

Mr. CORNELL—In my county the supervisors have concluded to let the officers have all they ask. If they refuse, they go to the judge, who decides without having the knowledge which guides the board of supervisors. I have been a supervisor for years. The salary is fixed, and when accepted, no honorable man should ask for more.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to strike out "alteration by," in second line of section 11, and "or otherwise," in third line.

Pending which, on motion of Mr. J. CLARK, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. SKINNER, the Convention adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. McCLELLAND proposed to amend the thirteenth rule, by adding the following words: "which shall be the section or article under consideration, as the Convention may direct."

Mr. McC. said there may be in some of the articles fifteen or twenty sections, each of which may embrace different propositions, on which much discussion may be had. The Convention may wish to cut off discussion on one of these, but not the other; under the present rule the previous question can only apply to the article itself. Gentlemen may get impatient and sustain the previous question on the article, before the whole of the sections are perfected. To obviate the difficulty that may arise, he proposed that the previous question may be moved on a section or the article, at the option of the mover.

Mr. N. PIERCE was apprehensive that it would open the door, and destroy the efficacy of the previous question. He would restrict it to the section; it might be improper to cut off discussion on the whole article.

Mr. McCLELLAND explained; it was his object to bring the previous question to bear on a section. Under the present rule, it could only apply to the article.

Mr. HANSCOM supported the amendment. It could do no harm, but might be useful in cutting off discussion on a single section, leaving the other sections open to amendment and discussion.

Mr. BRITAIN said the gentleman from Calhoun was right as to the practice in the Michigan Legislature; though the practice of the Convention had been different. The amendment, if adopted, would leave it at the option of a member to close debate on a section, and prevent members from offering amendments which they considered important. A large part of our discussion, said Mr. B., arises on amendments offered to amendments, the Convention not being able to get a vote on the amendment itself. If this proposition be adopted, it will allow the Convention to get rid of an amendment to an amendment, and its discussion; but he would appeal to the Convention to consider whether it would be proper to cut off members from offering further amendments which they may have matured, but which they have not had an opportunity of offering.

Mr. McCLELLAND called the previous question, which was sustained.

The main question was put, and the amendment to the rule was adopted—yeas 70, nays 22.

Mr. COOK offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on schedule be instructed to fix in their report the terms of the first officers elected under the revised Constitution, so that hereafter the election of all State and county officers shall take place upon the even numbered years, excepting such as may be made elective at the spring elections.

Mr. C. said he was not desirous of having action on the resolution this morning. He wished to call the attention of members to the subject. He supposed the provision for biennial sessions would be adopted.

By providing that the election of State and county officers should be held the same year the members of the Legislature were elected, an election might be dispensed with.

The resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS proposed the following:

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a provision in the new Constitution as follows: "The navigable waters of this State shall be common highways, and forever free to the inhabitants of this State and the United States."

Mr. N. PIERCE would like to know the object the gentleman had in view. Would it not prevent the State using the navigable waters, or what are considered such? He (Mr. P.) was apprehensive it would abridge the rights of the citizens and lead to difficulty.

Mr. WILLIAMS—Had the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. N. PIERCE,] been in his seat yesterday, he would have heard fully the reasons which prompted the introduction of this resolution.

His object was to define and not abridge rights. He thought no difficulty would arise as to what was considered navigability. He believed a principle ran through the decisions, that navigability was a fact to be tried and tested by evidence, and not fixed by any arbitrary rules.

Whether we adopt this provision or not, we must abide by the principle it contains, for the vital words are a mere abstract from the Ordinance of 1787. He offered the resolution to obviate future difficulties. He lived on the banks of the St. Joseph. One of his colleagues did. The other was a farmer, the products of whose industry had been transported on that river. But they had all seen obstructions erected from one end to the other of the river, especially in the adjacent State of Indiana, and our property dashed and scattered on the stream, and borne out upon the bosom of Lake Michigan. Practically there had been little redress, and he had never known damages recovered to any respectable amount, except in a single case between himself and others, and his friend from Berrien [Mr. BEESON] and others, to which allusion had heretofore been made. He sympathized with his friend, and regretted that the judgement had not been recovered against a less clever man. As long as these obstacles were interposed in defiance of law and justice, he saw no reason why a prohibition still more explicit should not be interposed.

Mr. MORRISON moved to lay the same upon the table; which did not prevail.

The resolution was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole on the general order, Mr. EASTON in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of "Article —, County Officers and County Government."

The question being upon Mr. J. D.

PIERCE's motion to strike out "no alteration," in second line of section 11, and "or otherwise," in third line, the same prevailed.

The question then recurring upon Mr. McLEOD's motion to strike out all after "counties," in second line,

Mr. SULLIVAN remarked that when an amendment would be in order, he would propose to amend by inserting after the word "counties," in the second line, the words "subject to appeal to the circuit court," striking out the balance of the section. The section proposed to confer upon the board of supervisors extraordinary powers. It proposed to make them a tribunal of last resort in all cases where county officers had claims for services against the county. The decision of no other tribunal in reference to claims was in all cases final. Cases might be appealed from a justice's court to the county court; they could be removed from the county to the circuit, from the circuit to the supreme court of the State; and in certain cases from the supreme court of the State to the supreme court of the United States. But the decision of a board of supervisors it was proposed to place beyond the reach of appeal. He did not believe it was proper or just. It was a matter in which he had not the slightest personal concern. He had had occasion to present claims to the board of supervisors. He had never appealed from their decisions. He had never complained of them. He had very little expectation that he should ever again present a claim to them for allowance; and if he did, their decision must not only be wrong, but palpably so, before he should appeal. He felt no personal interest, therefore, in the subject; still he was opposed to the section, and the various amendments taking away the right of appeal. Upon what ground are such extravagant powers to be committed to a board of supervisors? How are they constituted that they should be more intelligent and more pure and immaculate than any other tribunal of the State? They consist generally, it is true, of intelligent and upright men; but surely it is no treason to say that they are subject to the common weaknesses and infirmities of humanity—that partiality, prejudice, ambition and avarice operate upon their minds as they do upon the minds of others. If there is any thing in their situation adapted to excite those feelings, it will produce its common effects.

Now, sir, in looking at the constitution of that body, it may naturally strike every one that, in the settlement of claims, it is partial and interested. It is composed of a part of the tax payers of the county—claims are presented for adjudication to debtors, and their decision is to be final. The bare statement of the proposition is a condemnation of it. It shocks every idea of justice.

The number of the body, consisting as it does of from fifteen to twenty men, prevents any full examination of claims. A claim must be considerable, or its amount will be used up in the discussion of it. The supervisors, aware of that fact, acquire a habit of giving to the claims of county officers and others but a slight examination. Again, to fix the claims of county officers properly, it is necessary to inquire into facts—the services rendered, and the value of them. But the supervisors have no power to compel the attendance of witnesses, or to swear them, or any other of the ordinary powers for the investigation and ascertainment of truth. Should the decision of a board, thus limited in its power to ascertain facts, thus necessarily restricted in the discussion of them, be final? Again, the board is made up of politicians—of persons anxious for political preferment. Their great object is to obtain popularity by reducing taxes—they are under very strong temptations to reject claims without reference to their justice. Again, they are under strong inducements to log-rolling, a species of employment not very productive of the purity of any tribunal. Each supervisor is anxious to reduce the assessment of his own township as low as possible; and that has a tendency to lead to combinations that will affect to some extent all the transactions of the board. Each supervisor has claims to present for citizens of his own township, which he is desirous should pass. While, therefore, the general tendency of the board will be to cut down just claims, it will often happen that by log-rolling efforts, extravagant claims will be allowed. Such is the character and situation and constituent parts of the tribunal that it is proposed to invest with the power of final adjudication, beyond the power of appeal, of all claims in favor of county officers. Now, what is the character of the claims they examine? Most of them are presented by legal officers. The proper settlement of them involves a knowledge of the laws, and the proper mode of construing them. And yet, supervisors are elected without any reference to their qualifications in this respect. They are chosen by towns, almost entirely with a view to their qualifications as assessors. Let an appeal be allowed to the Circuit Court, and you have a tribunal well acquainted with the laws—perfectly impartial, and possessing the facilities for the ascertainment of facts, to review the decisions of the board of supervisors. It has been urged that no appeal should be allowed from the decisions of the board of supervisors, for the extraordinary reason that the Circuit Court has frequently reversed their opinions. Could a stronger argument against their infallibility be offered? Could a more cogent reason be presented for the allowance of appeals? Which is most likely to be right, the supervisors or the court? Which tribunal is generally most enlightened—most impartial—most familiar with the laws? It is no disparagement to the board, to say that the question admits of only one answer. He had as much respect for the board of supervisors as some who were more profuse in their encomiums; but he did not believe they would covet the responsibility attempted to be cast upon them, and he did not believe it was just to impose it. He believed if the voice of the supervisors throughout the State could be heard upon this subject, it would be in favor of the right of appeal.

Mr. HASCALL—Our Governor, Secretary of State and Judges have their salaries fixed. They accept their offices with a full knowledge of what they will receive; they know beforehand what compensation to expect. Would it be just that the officers of this House, knowing what they would receive, should apply to the tribunals of the State for further compensation? I think not. Well, sir, the board of supervisors have the same relation to the county that the Legislature has to the State. They are the proper officers to fix a compensation for the servants of the county. They do so, and the incumbent knows what he is to expect.

Is it just that a person should appeal from a board of supervisors to a court which knows nothing of the circumstances of the case, or the ability of the county to pay exorbitant charges? It is unjust; it is against principle so to do. If I hire a man at ten dollars per month, when I pay him, he has all that he ought to expect; he has no right to go before a court to compel me to pay more. Common sense forbids the supposition.

Mr. MOORE had hoped yesterday that the discussion on this question was through. The only difficulty, perhaps, was that the provision was not broad enough or strong enough, or the Convention would put it through. Whether there should be an appeal or not, from the board of supervisors, was a question he considered settled. He thought the board the best tribunal to settle those matters. It is usually composed of fifteen or twenty of the best men of a county; they are elected for this purpose, and every question brought before them would be settled justly.

To appeal from a jury of such comprehension, who have all the facts before them, and take it to a single judge, on ex parte evidence, would be improper. He [Mr. M.] saw no impropriety in the board settling every claim or matter belonging to the county. He would allow them to settle and fix both the salaries and fees of officers in a county. A section of that kind, he believed, would pass without opposition.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD, if he understood the amendments offered, believed that none of them proposed to fix the compensation before the election of officers. He believed such an amendment to be necessary, and when in order would propose an amendment of that character.

Mr. GOODWIN would ask a question. Suppose a board of supervisors should fix the salary of a prosecuting attorney, and he should apply to the board for an order for his pay, and some of the supervisors should suppose he had been negligent or unskillful in performing the duties of his office, and should say we will allow you one-half. The question he [Mr. G.] would ask was—how they would dispose of a case of this kind without appeal?

Another question; he would ask the gentleman from Kalamazoo if the courts of that county were in the habit of hearing and deciding cases on ex parte evidence?

Mr. HASCALL—The individual might apply for a writ of mandamus to compel them; he would not allow him to resort to appeal.

Mr. WALKER—Mr. Chairman: as every one seems disposed to add his mite to the construction of this section, I will read a substitute I propose to offer. [Mr. W. read:] "The board of supervisors shall have the exclusive power to prescribe and fix the compensation for all services rendered for, and adjust all claims against their respective counties."

What has been attempted in this bill? What is asked for by the people? It is, that we shall confer local legislation on the respective boards of supervisors. Now, sir, what is the nature of the provision intended to be introduced? It is to allow the board of supervisors the exercise of legislative powers on certain matters in the county, as the Legislature exercises it in the State at large. Now our State Legislature fixes the salaries as much as they can, beforehand. The Legislature have always acted without appeal as to what should be allowed. It seems absurd that an appeal should be had from the decision of the Legislature, except that appeal which a man has to a succeeding Legislature. The same principle should be carried out. The salaries of the officers should be fixed as far as possible. The supervisors should also adjust the claims against the county, without appeal. An individual who supposed a board had done wrong would have the right to present his claim again to the next board.

The amendment offered by Mr. McLEOD was negatived.

Mr. BUSH offered the following substitute for section 11: "The board of supervisors shall have the power to settle all claims for services rendered their respective counties; and from their decision there shall be no appeal."

Mr. WALKER offered the amendment he had previously read as a substitute.

Mr. CRARY did not think the section, as reported, broad enough. It only applies to county officers. There are justices of the peace who are both township and county officers; they are elected in the township, but their jurisdiction extends over the county. There are constables—about half the claims come from those officers for services rendered to the county. He wished some member would offer an amendment to embrace that class of cases. On claims of physicians, an appeal to the court might be had. The difficulty was not in the fact of the appeal itself, but to the leaving it to the judge himself. The appeal is to the court, and the decision is that the judge is the arbiter of the court. If a jury could be had it might be different.

Mr. BUSH—The substitute I have offered covers every claim that can by any possibility come against a county.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I shall go for no appeal, provided one provision is put in the section: if not, I shall go against it. I suppose it is proposed that a compensation shall be fixed before election, and that it shall not be diminished during the term for which the officer is elected. With regard to claims of a different character, you cannot anticipate beforehand. I would not have the board fix the fees of the Judge of Probate; but for the officers of the county, the supervisors are the best judges of the compensation for their services; but let it be fixed beforehand.

Mr. CORNELL—I have an amendment if I ever shall get a chance to offer it, for fixing the salaries of the county officers, and leaving the board to adjust the other claims for services against the county. Compensation should be fixed before the election of officers, and no appeal should be allowed.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE believed the substitute offered by Mr. BUSH covered the whole ground. You may as well allow our Governor and State officers to appeal from the decision of the Legislature. More iniquity has been practiced in the State under appeals than from any other cause. He hoped it would be adopted, whatever other amendments might be added.

Mr. TIFFANY read an amendment, which he proposed to offer when in order.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH hoped the amendment would not prevail. He had listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion. It aims at the abolishing of a long established principle; and (said Mr. Van V.) I have not heard an argument advanced that convinces me that it is right,

We have been told that the boards are composed of good men, who have to pay the taxes. We should have been told that they are interested men—that they are tax payers. They are not only tax payers, but have popularity to gain in the townships. I say they are interested. My friend seems horror stricken at the thought of appealing from the decision of a board of supervisors to a single judge. We do not propose to appeal to a single judge; but to a man conversant with the law. In all cases there should be an appeal from a board of supervisors. I trust that they will not strike at the principle that there should always be an appeal from a board that is interested.

It is no objection to the system that it has been abused. Abuses have taken place and will take place under any system; but I hope gentlemen will be influenced by the principle which is right.

Mr. WOODMAN said—Mr. Chairman, I would say one word. I have taken no part in the debate on this question, and I had hoped that it was closed.

If my colleague [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH] would consult the interests and feelings of his constituents, I believe he would go for it. If he thinks I am mistaken in regard to the views and feelings of the people of Oakland county, he had better consult the letter he received.

Gentlemen have told their stories in regard to those appeals; I now want to tell mine. A certain person appealed from the board of supervisors in my county, and the result was that the judge allowed him some twenty-seven dollars more than he asked.

If there is not a feeling in Oakland county against allowing appeals from the board of supervisors, I do not understand it; though I have not been favored with a letter from my constituents on that subject.

On motion of Mr. J. D. PIERCE, the substitute offered by Mr. WALKER was amended by adding “and the sum so fixed and defined shall be subject to no appeal.”

The question was taken on Mr. WALKER's substitute as amended, and carried.

The motion to strike out the section and insert the substitute prevailed.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend, as follows: Add to end of section, “and the compensation of officers shall in all cases be fixed before their election, and shall not be diminished during their terms of office.”

Mr. W. ADAMS moved to amend the amendment, by striking out “diminished,” and inserting “altered.” Which was disagreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON hoped the amendment he had offered would be adopted. The amount of compensation should be fixed before the election. They should know what they have to receive. If the services are worth $800, and the board think they can be done for $150, I am willing that they should try it; but I would not give the board power to diminish the salary after a person has gone into office. The word “altered” was objectionable; the duties of the office may be increased ten-fold, particularly in the case of prosecuting attorney. During one year there may not be much business; in the next he may be much engaged in suppressing crime. In such case the board would be willing to allow further compensation.

Mr. CORNELL said—My young friend from Macomb, for whom I have a great deal of esteem, has made a proposition to meet what appears to me to be an impossible case. To diminish, is a thing I never heard of.

Mr. WALKER—If the amount each constable shall receive, and the amount the sheriff shall receive, be fixed before they are elected, the board ought to have more omniscience than any body of men he ever knew.

Mr. ROBERTSON—You are not to impugn the high standing of a board of supervisors, but the Legislature is to be bound with all sorts of strong cords; but; like the Legislature, they will be subject to the same passions and failings. As to the question that the pay cannot be fixed before hand, it always has been. Fees are fixed, and they ought to be fixed in advance as well as salaries.

The amendment was negatived.

Sec. 12. The Legislature may hereafter confer upon the board of supervisors of the several counties of the State, such further powers of local legislation and administration as they may deem proper.

Mr. BAGG offered the following as a substitute for the section:

"The several boards of supervisors of this State may hereafter confer upon the Legislature of this State such powers of local and general legislation and administration as they may deem proper."

Mr. BAGG would assure gentlemen that he was serious in offering this substitute. The legal gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] told us yesterday, that he was more for a town than he was for a county, and several gentlemen concurred with him. We are here, the majesty of the people, defining the powers of legislation. We are to have two legislative bodies. I wish to know which is to be uppermost? These boards of supervisors are made the supreme court of the State. I wish to know if they are not also to be placed above the Legislature. You give them supreme judicial power—why not give them supreme legislative power?

Mr. B. said—I put this out as a feeler. There seems to be a disposition in the whole land to resolve us into our original elements. There is a disposition to break up the bonds of democracy. He had supposed that there were eighty delegates here prepared to sustain it, and that they would make a constitution to sustain it. I hope (said Mr. B.) to have the support of the gentleman from Calhoun. He says he is more for a town than a county—then he must go for the supervisors having the greatest legislative power. The legislative article comes in to-morrow—the judiciary next. They will all be dovetailed and put in with this principle. Sir, I am against all this, and I wish to set myself right. We are about to destroy the organic law of the land, which will in twelve months bring us into an inglorious minority. I wash my hands of it.

A division was called for, and the question being on striking out section 12, the committee refused to strike out; so the substitute was lost.

Mr. EASTMAN offered the following amendment: amend section 9, by adding after the word "seat," in first line, the words "except in the county of Ottawa."

Mr. E. said—It is with respectful deference to the wisdom, sound judgment, and great experience of the members of this committee that I offer this singular amendment. After witnessing the votes upon this section in committee yesterday, I have but little hope, little expectation, that it will be favorably entertained—that it will prevail; indeed, sir, I could not well reconcile my own vote in its favor. Were we acting as a legislative body, carrying out the minute details of law, I might then hope and expect that this amendment would prevail; but as our business is to fix the general fundamental principles as the guide to future legislation, I can scarcely expect it to be adopted. I offer it for the purpose of drawing the attention of the committee to the bearing of the section, as reported by the standing committee, not only upon the county of Ottawa, but also to its bearing upon several other organized counties in the State, as well as its obvious effect upon the new counties after they shall have become organized with county seats—established—which is, sir, virtually to fix permanently and forever those sites, however far aside they may have been thus early located from the future convenience of a majority of the people of the county. It would be utterly impossible under this constitutional restriction, ever to remove a county seat. Where, like rays radiating from a centre, the influence of those who hold office, who necessarily reside there, together with the power exerted by the business influences that naturally spring up, in and around these points, with the jealousies that never fail to be stirred up in the several localities claiming it, around the central and proper point for it, certainly would render any removal hopeless. Seven-eighths of the inhabitants must think its present location an evil—must favor its removal—in order to secure a two-thirds vote of the people, or a majority vote of the board of supervisors, ever to designate "the place to which it is proposed to be removed." Under such influences, sir, how will it be in the new counties yet to be organized? How has it been heretofore, in regard to their first settlements, as in Ottawa, wholly on one side, or perhaps upon one extreme corner, or one end of a very long county? As soon as organization takes place, the county seat must be established—and where is it usually established? Near the geographical centre, where it will prospectively convene the whole county? No, sir, it is placed in the then settlement, to accommodate the people of the county at the time, and far away from the central locality, where it would convene a very large majority of the county when fully settled. Under this constitutional restriction, sir, I can easily see that any county seat thus sectionally located, must remain unmoved, perhaps forever; until at least seven-eighths of the inhabitants view its situation as adverse to their individual interests, inasmuch as a large number of those who view its removal to be just and proper, yet they will be brought under such influences as will cause them to not act, or to act contrary to their interest in this matter. We are engaged in forming a constitution that is designed to remain unaltered for fifteen or twenty years. I do therefore hope that this section, which as it now stands must operate so injuriously upon many counties now organized, with their early established and one-sided county sites, as also upon most of the new ones yet to be admitted to organization during this period. I say, sir, I do hope that it will receive some modification. I will withdraw the amendment, and if in order, I would offer a substitute for section nine, which I believe would do away with many of the objections I entertain to this section, as it came from the hands of the standing committee.

Mr. E. then, on request of several members, read the substitute, as follows:

"The board of supervisors may determine when the county seat, not located centrally in the county, ought to be removed, and notify the Governor of such determination; whose duty it shall be to appoint forthwith three competent and disinterested persons, not residents of said county, to relocate the same as near the geographical centre as may be found practicable and convenient for all the inhabitants thereof; which relocation shall be approved or rejected by a major vote of the electors of said county, given at the next general election held thereafter."

A question of order being raised, the motion was decided out of order; the committee having previously refused to strike out section 9.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the committee rose, and through their chairman reported back the article entitled "County Officers and County Government," with various amendments, in which the concurrence of the Convention was asked.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the article.

On motion of Mr. COOK, it was laid upon the table and ordered printed with amendments.

Mr. McCLELLAND called from the table the article entitled "Legislative Department."

The question being upon concurring with the amendments made in committee of the whole, and the first amendment being under consideration,

Mr. McCLELLAND moved further to amend by striking out the word "one," and inserting the words "not more than three."

A division of the question being called, Mr. FRALICK said he had supposed that the question was settled; that the Convention had decided upon having single Senatorial districts. As far as he had had an opportunity of ascertaining the wishes of the people, they were in favor of single districts.

Mr. WHITE said that previous to adjournment he had entertained doubts respecting the propriety of establishing single Senatorial districts; but he had found in traveling home, there was no difference of opinion among the people on the subject. It was no party question. The people have settled down in the opinion that there should be single districts for Senators as well as Representatives. He was compelled, therefore, from a sense of duty, to vote against striking out.

Mr. WILLIAMS would beg to say in the county he in part represented, the people were unanimously in favor of single districts, both for Representatives and Senators.

Mr. J. CLARK had always supposed that the object in creating a Senate was to make it a conservative body, so that it should operate as a check on the hasty and immature legislation of the more popular branch. That object was proposed to be accomplished by electing the members for a longer time, and making them the representatives of more general interests. By making the Senate a more numerous body, by electing in single districts and for a shorter period, the object for which the Senate was created would be lost. He [Mr. C.] was opposed to increasing the number of Senators; he believed that the object would be better secured by electing twenty-four, or even a less number, than by thirty-two, as proposed in the article. We have a numerous body provided for, in the shape of representatives, by which every portion of a county will be represented. Senators ought to be elected to represent more general interests. Single districts would operate to destroy the object in view in creating a Senate.

I, (said Mr. C.,) should be sorry to make the body too democratic. I agree with my friend from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG,] that we should always be for that which will produce the greatest amount of good, and strengthen the democratic party. For these reasons I am in favor of the original proposition.

Mr. WELLS—I have attended to the remarks of my friend from St. Clair. In nine cases out of ten, in the doings in this Convention, I have coincided in his views. In this case I am afraid he is wrong—entirely wrong. I am aware that if any part of the delegation from Kalamazoo would strike at the single district system, the people would strike him at the ballot-box so cold, so dead, that the galvanism of a convention, or the wild cat operations of a mass meeting, would never resuscitate him.

Mr. BACKUS said if he understood the opinions of the people, it was their wish to elect by single districts; and to this he saw no objection. Does it strip the Senate of its conservative character? Who elect the Senators? The same who vote for Representatives—whether they vote on a ratio of five thousand or one hundred thousand, it is the same constituency. It is capable of being apportioned into single districts; it is the desire of the people that that should be the result; and unless substantial reasons could be shown to the contrary, the public should be gratified in their desire. He [Mr. B.] could see much benefit that would accrue from gratifying the public desire. It would bring the representative, whether in the House or the Senate, more immediately in connection with his constituents.

They would have a better opportunity of knowing his capacity for representing them. As an advisory power to the executive, they have nothing to do—with appointments they have nothing to do—that is given to the constituency; and are you afraid to allow persons to make our laws, when you give them power to elect our judges and executive officers? I see no reason why it should be struck out.

Mr. BRITAIN said he had offered on a former occasion an amendment providing for double districts, and for electing Senators from each half of the district alternately; that would have preserved the conservative character of the Senate, as desired by the friends of double districts, and secured to each half its Senator as effectually as single districts. That amendment was not sustained by the Convention. He had therefore no resource but to fall back on single districts.

Mr. S. CLARK said the provision for single districts was inserted on his motion. He had seen no reason to change the views he entertained of single districts. He believed it to be right and democratic. He believed the interests of the democratic party would be best subserved by acting always right and never wrong. Single districts [said Mr. C.] with us are popular; they bring down power to the people; and I believe in this State it will be wisely administered.

Mr. BAGG—I see an interesting time coming. Our whig and free soil friends anticipate a good time, and it will come. Those gentleman have been still; and why? Because democrats are doing the business themselves. We are getting into the meshes of the net while playing at blind Harry—but now they are afraid we cannot any longer be hoodwinked, and that the double system will prevail; hence you see the gentleman with the double principle, who represents the triangle, begins to have apprehensions that the double district system will go.

Mr. COOK read in answer to the statements of Mr. BAGG, an article from the Free Press of April last, just previous to the election of delegates, containing propositions of reform, in which they strongly urge the adoption of biennial sessions and the single district system, and conclude by saying “we shall consider the Convention a failure if these propositions are not adopted.”

Mr. C. said—I claim that this is a democratic measure, and I would not allow our whig friends to take the lead in it. In the county of Hillsdale every man is in favor of it. Nineteen out of every twenty of the people of the State would vote for single districts.

Mr. WHITE said, the county I in part represent, is a democratic county. I was sent here by democratic votes, and I consider myself virtually instructed by my county. I have said that I doubt the policy of the measure, but I support it from a sense of duty to my constituents, and not as a whig.

Mr. BAGG—I am sorry to find any delegate founding an argument upon something they have read in a newspaper, and especially the Free Press. It is said to be the most intelligent paper in the State. Sir, their intelligence is only equalled by their benevolence.

While we were the banner State, the democracy were assailed by coons, log cabins and cider barrels; they have stood the shot, and yet remain the banner State. Yet the Free Press, in a fit of cold ague, published that miserable article. When I was a boy I believed that every thing printed was true; but since that time I have not believed any such thing.

How long was the Free Press against banks? How is it now? Do they not vacillate and pander to banks? Newspapers pander to politicians. One set, like Jackson, make public sentiment; another, like Van Buren, mouse after it. Those men vacillate too much; what one year they say are the unalterable, cardinal principles of democracy, the next year they abandon. I care nothing whatever for the Free Press; I judge for myself. I know, sir, the adoption of this measure will sever the masses and break up the democratic party. I know that the indomitable masses, when taken together, like Æsop's bundle of sticks, cannot be broken; they can beat both coons and log cabins—nothing can withstand them.

It has been said, "as the township of Hamtramck goes, so goes the county of Wayne; and as the county of Wayne goes, so goes the State." So established is this fact, that in '41 they robbed the Hamtramck ballot box. By that means they defeated the will of the people of that township, and not of that only, but of the people of Wayne county and of the whole State; and by that means maintained an ascendancy for another year. Hamtramck gives a majority of 500 votes; they will have a representative, and 150 votes will be lost to the county. In the first ward of the city, the case will be the same. Since 1840, not a whig member has graced the halls of legislation. The gentleman only, [Mr. BACKUS,] belonging to that party, is here from the county of Wayne; and his peculiar popularity and talents brought him here. But adopt single districts, and how will the county of Wayne stand? We all know that the very first moment you get into this system, one-half will come here whigs. The case will be the same in Oakland and several other counties. Is it right and proper, standing in the relation as 80 to 20, to make a law, and say the masses shall not have their rights? to bind them hand and foot, and not have the advantage of union?

Mr. FRALICK had hoped no party feeling would have been brought in here. He had supposed they had met to make a constitution for the people, not for the democratic or whig or free soil party. From the gentleman's speech, one would suppose he was in some ward caucus, making a speech for some particular purpose before an election.

Mr. F. concurred in the views quoted from the Free Press; it was the view entertained by the people of Wayne county. He was disposed to make a constitution right and proper, and what would suit the people; he did not care about its effects on one party or the other. The electors will have the matter more under their immediate control; they can judge of the qualifications of a candidate. In a large district they are nominated at a caucus, we know how—they are elected on a party ticket. If the democratic party be lessened, it will be stronger. He wished no man to go to the Legislature as a representative of a particular class of politicians, but by the voice of the people.

On motion of Mr. STOREY, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The consideration of the article entitled "Legislative Department" was resumed; and the question being on striking out the word "one," as proposed by Mr. McCLELLAND,

Mr. J. BARTOW said, before the vote was taken, he wished to express his views on the subject. He was in favor of striking out "one," and inserting "three." He believed, if we were to have a Senate at all, and preserve its identity, the members should be elected in a different manner from the representatives. If the same mode is adopted, it does away with the Senate as a Senate, and makes it an adjunct of the House. They will be elected by the same men, come at the same time, and will form but one body, though they sit in different rooms. If it be the object to have but one body, we may as well do away with the idea of having a Senate. It is but a popular body, having no more influence over the popular will than the House. If they are going to change the form of government, and this department can be done away with, say so, and abolish it. Do not do it indirectly, and leave it merely in name. I am willing [said Mr. B.] to assume that no republic can long exist without the three departments; that none ever did long exist without some check on the popular part. All history and experience prove it. I am not prepared for it, and shall not vote for the change in the bill.

If the Senate is formed into single districts, and the Senators are to be elected the same as the Representatives, I shall go for abolishing it in name, as it will be in fact, and try the experiment of carrying on a republican government with one branch only.

Mr. CRARY took the chair at the request of the PRESIDENT.

Mr. HANSCOM said—I wish to state briefly the reasons for the final vote I shall cast on this matter. I regard the action we are about taking on the legislative department as fraught with much importance to the State, and a young member of this Convention may wish to have his reasons go with his vote. I will state that I respect the public will. I believe we are bound by it when fully expressed; but, sir, there is another will, sometimes called the public will, so far from being respected, ought to be resisted by every person seeking the public good.

Look at our national history, and you will see the necessity of resisting this popular clamor of the public mind. How was it during the time of General Jackson? What was the effect of his resistance to public opinion? It was to guard the people against an institution dangerous to the public, and which subsequent events have confirmed. Take the last fifteen years in the history of our own State. Had our public men resisted the public will, benefits would have accrued to us very materially affecting us at this time as a State. Refer to our five million loan and to our wild cat banks. Public sentiment demanded them; and the Executive and the Legislature had not courage to resist. It was what had grown up as public opinion, which in a few months would have been discarded. I firmly believe that members are now casting their votes under the influence of a supposed public sentiment created without—which will be counteracted by the sober second thought—a sentiment manufactured by a few newspaper scribblers in the State.

I believe in my county, as at present advised, the people think the single district system and biennial sessions are necessary; that it will reduce expense and lessen legislation, without reflecting that we are going to cut off local legislation; without reflecting that we may fix some general principles, leaving the legislature to enact general laws, which they can get through in a short session. This does away with the cry for single districts and short sessions.

But it is said you must bring the representative down to his constituents. That is the only argument of any weight. But, sir, are there no dangers to be apprehended from this system, which may more than counterbalance the advantages? Take a small community, among whom there may be an aristocratic nabob with his millions. Hundreds of persons may be dependent on him for employment. He, sir, will have absolute control in his district. Take a moneyed corporation in a small village. Their influence among the middle and mercantile classes will over-ride the sentiments of the community. Is there no danger in this? Will it not localize so as to bring the power into the hands of an individual, rather than the people? In larger circles they cannot govern them all. I bring this as a reason why you should not bring the representative nearer to his constituents. We might as well say that a single township shall elect the Governor, because they know him.

This will reduce the character of our Legislature—men of less ability and less integrity will be elected from your counties. I am aware that it will be disastrous to the interests of the people, and that in less than five years a change will be called for. I do not suppose that any argument I can adduce will change a single vote in this Convention; but I am willing that my convictions shall go forth with my instructions. I recognize myself as the mere agent of the popular will, and I must act in accordance with it; but it is my conscientious belief that popular opinion will be changed.

In the northern portion of Michigan, to some extent, there has been a public opinion manufactured and fixed, and so far as it is expressed, they are in favor of single districts, both representative and senatorial. The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. FRALICK] expressed his regret that allusions were made to political organizations. I have no such delicacy, nor ever had. If a man believes that the good of the country depends upon such a particular form of government, should he not direct his attention in the Convention, as well as elsewhere, to that class of measures which will keep in the ascendancy a particular political party? I believe conscientiously that, applied to us as a State, and as a Union, on the democratic principle being sustained, depends the permanency of our Union and the prosperity of our citizens.

I shall vote for the fullest extreme which the gentleman claims as due to public opinion and instructions. I shall go for biennial sessions—for the single district system for representatives; then I shall go on and apply it to Senators; and last, I shall vote that they be elected for two years. Then, sir, I shall say the Senate has become a useless body; that it will be anything but a counterpart to the House—that it will be a court of reference made of the same materials—a mere dignified appendage to that body; and I believe it would be as well to consummate our measures of reform by cutting it loose, and leave the Executive and one branch of the Legislature to govern the people. It would not be more dangerous than the present plan—the action proposed by this Convention.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I have not heard any good reason for adopting the principle of double districts. All the argument goes to show that the single district system, as applied as well to Senators as Representatives, is called for. I believe that it is a question well understood in every part of the country. Some counties have not expressed their opinion in public meetings; but many have, and in some the expression has been nearly unanimous. I have not heard one argument that has convinced me that single Senatorial and Representative districts are not preferable. How would it answer to elect Senators and Representatives through the entire State by a general ticket? Sir, the proposition would not be listened to a moment. The single district system is better; it brings those elected nearer to the people. We are bound to act in the best manner for the people that we can, whether they ask for it or not. They have not asked not to have it. In the county in which I live, there will be some difficulties; we shall not have population enough to entitle us to two Senators, while we will have a large fraction more than will entitle us to one.

Yet, I would still prefer the system. I would rather elect a Senator from our county—at some time or other we shall be entitled to two Senators. I believe there will be no difficulty in the county of Wayne. We shall all be better represented. I see no difficulty in the matter at all.

Mr. KINGSLEY—I shall vote for the single Senate system, and I think the reasons will apply the same for that measure, as that of the single Representative system. It is said that the Senate is a conservative body. Why, I have seen the House more conservative than the Senate. As far as my experience goes, matters are more generally presented in a crude and unfinished state in the Senate than in the House. With respect to this conservative feeling, which is by some thought necessary, and which is derived from the English constitution, it is proper to remember that ours differs in principle somewhat from the English. The Senate is different from the House of Lords. They are a sort of half way between the King and the House of Commons.

The Senate of the United States is differently situated from the Senate here.

It is beyond popular feeling for a term of six years. It may be proper to elect them for a term of four years, so that by going out on rotation we shall not at any one time have an inexperienced body; but I see no force in the argument that if elected for a larger district they will be more beyond popular feeling or popular prejudice.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I supposed that this question would have been decided without discussion, and did not intend further to trespass upon the attention of the members, as I had given my views at some length on it, in committee; but I feel called upon to reply to some of the remarks that have been made.

The delegates from Monroe are differently situated in one respect from many who have addressed the Convention. They come here without any instructions; and it is a characteristic of that county that their representatives are never instructed, but always expected to do their duty, and be able to account faithfully on their return to their constituents. We come, then, untrammelled, and are left to the dictates of our own judgment. If we were merely acting for the benefit of the county of Monroe, we should without any hesitation vote for single senatorial districts, because it must be evident to all who have paid any attention to the subject, that by this method the influence of the large counties is broken, and the smaller counties obtain more power than they possessed before. Connected with small counties as heretofore, the large counties would to a certain extent, control the whole; and hence, in many respects, the single senatorial and representative system would result to our advantage. Impose it upon the counties of Wayne, Oakland and Washtenaw, and you destroy much of their present political importance.

But I look upon the question in quite a different aspect. I am for preserving the distinctive features of the Senate, and giving to it that character it should possess, in order to answer its original purpose. Adopt the measure proposed by the committee of the whole, and in my judgment there will be little gained by having two separate bodies. You might with as much propriety and utility divide the House into two distinct bodies, and require the bills to pass through the same ordeal as at present; or appoint a dozen of the more experienced and talented members to act as a council of review on the acts of the other members.

The gentleman from Wayne says that the interests and people represented in the Senate and House ought to be the same, and you should bring the members of both as near the people as possible. This is contrary to my idea of a Senate. I have always supposed a Senate should be differently constituted from the House, and should represent different interests and people, and that it should not be confined to the same territory. This idea of the gentleman is the reverse of that entertained by the framers of most other constitutions. The constitution of the United States, which, in this regard, has been so highly lauded by the gentleman from Calhoun, [Mr. PIERCE,] is founded upon a different principle. The Senate there represents the sovereignty of the States and territory, rather than population; and the grand idea was to have the representation in the one House different from that in the other. I want as far as practicable to assimilate our Senate to that, and preserve as many of its features as we can, consistent with the views and preconceived notions of our people. We find that in every State where it has been adopted, it has worked well, and has had a most salutary and happy effect. We find moreover that wherever the Senate has been abolished, the result has been most disastrous, and that with great unanimity the old system was speedily re-adopted, and this feature in the constitution restored. Such was the case in Vermont and Pennsylvania.

We have, then, the experience of nearly all who have preceded us—of the different States—of the framers of the constitution of the United States, and particularly of the two States already alluded to, and which tried a similar experiment; and it appears to me to be unwise not to profit by it.

Gentlemen say we take the Senators away from the people, and destroy their responsibility to them. I attach no importance to this argument; for with the same propriety you might say the Governor was taken away from the people, because the district electing him is larger. I confess I cannot understand this objection.

The gentleman from Washtenaw [Mr. KINGSLEY] says that he has been a member of both houses, and that one is as conservative as the other; but, on the whole, he thinks the House is a little more conservative than the Senate. This may have been so; but it is to be regretted that men elected as Senators should have so far forgotten for what they were elected. We know what the design of the Senate is, and what its character should be; and what has been its conduct heretofore, should not prevent us from constructing it properly now. We should indulge the hope that the older we grow the wiser we may become; and that under the new constitution a new order of things will arise, and that all our institutions will be appreciated and their design carried out. If what the gentleman states be correct, it only shows that whilst the gentleman was a member of the Senate, it did not possess that character which it should have, and which the people and this Convention desire to confer upon it.

I ask the delegate if a Senator representing more than one county is as apt to be moved by the excitement that may prevail in one of the counties of his district, as if he were the representative of that county alone? Is he not more competent and better fitted to represent the whole people calmly and dispassionately in the one case than the other? Make him responsible to a large extent of territory, and although he may reside in the midst of the popular excitement, yet he will generally survey the whole district, and act in accordance with the desires and interests of all. Representatives have charge of particular localities; but Senators should have their attention directed to large districts, and to the interests of the whole State. Experience teaches us that the Representative confines himself to the county in which he resides; and it is of importance, if you have a second body, to so construct it as to serve some useful purpose relative to the other. I appeal to the members of this Convention, and ask with great confidence, whether any one believes that a representative from a single district in a county, and a Senator chosen in the same county, will not in most cases represent the interests of the whole county, and partake to the same extent the popular feelings and passions of the county? They will be affected in the same way, and be actuated by the same motives; and the only thing gained is an increase of representation.

[Here Mr. McC. read from one of the numbers of the Federalist, Mr. Madison's views upon the design of a Senate, and commented upon and applied them to the question under discussion.]

It is said the people are in favor of the single Senatorial district system. It may be so; but my impression is, if they would take into consideration the proper design of such a body, they would not be. Why are the people so unanimously in favor of single representative districts? One of the principal reasons is, that the people in the rural districts think that the politicians in your cities and villages, manage your conventions, and too often outrage their feelings, and that this system will enable them to avoid such evils. With your single Representative districts, and your political conventions adapted to them, one of the most important objections to the old Senatorial system is obviated, because a fairer and more satisfactory representation in your conventions can be had. Reduce the number of Senators to a single district, and a reduction of the term of service will necessarily follow. It will not answer to have only half the districts elect a Senator every two years, and I am satisfied a large majority of the Convention are opposed to it. I shall therefore feel myself compelled to vote for the term of two years, although by so doing we deprive the Legislature of the experience the other system would give. The object of the committee when they recommended four years as the term of service was, that the Senators should be returned from double districts—one to be elected every second year from each district. This would keep in the Senate a certain number of experienced men, who would be of great service in the legislation of the State. But the system which will probably be adopted, will entirely deprive you of this aid. In framing the constitution, we should look to the future as well as the present. The small counties may experience some inconvenience from the operation of the present system; but it will not be long before those counties will be densely populated, and there will be no further cause for complaint. Again, many of the counties that will be now well suited with the single district system, may at the next apportionment be as badly off as some of those counties opposing it.

We are preparing a fundamental law for, perhaps, millions to come; and it behooves us, if practicable, to establish some rule which will meet most of the contingencies that may arise. I cannot conceive of a better plan than to leave the matter to the Legislature, with such limitation as I have proposed. My desire has been to make the Senate a conservative body, and a check upon the House of Representatives. The single district system may preserve some of its usefulness, but I fear it will deprive it of many of its most valuable characteristics.

Mr. N. PIERCE said the argument of the gentleman from Monroe, convinced him the single district system was right. One of the objects, as the gentleman had stated, was to limit log-rolling—to bring it down to the people who vote for the representatives. In large districts, with four members, the outsiders have very little influence in the nominations. The gentleman had stated it right; it was to break down that organization which goes against the will of the people.

Mr. P. did not think the argument of the gentleman was correct in one respect; he did not think the Senate of Michigan should be considered as similar to the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States was not a representative body; but we get up our Senate on the same representative principle as the House. Though he did not consider the Senate of Michigan to partake of that high aristocratic character as the Senate of the United States, yet he was not disposed to merge that body with the House of Representatives. It would be safer to retain two houses.

The gentleman from Wayne says it is going to destroy the influence of the great counties. It would prevent them swallowing up the little ones. If you join small bodies of people with large ones, they can do nothing—they are in the minority. As soon as a county has a sufficient population for a Senator, let them have one; it will break down the influence of the great counties, and bring the representatives nearer to the people. The nearer it comes home to the people, the better. The system appeared more rational and systematic.

The question was taken on the amendment to strike out "one" and insert "not more than three," and lost:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, J. Bartow, Beeson, Butterfield, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Crary, Crouse, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Gibson, Graham, Hart, Marvin, McClelland, McLeod, Mosher, Mowry, J. D. Pierce, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, M. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Sullivan, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Williams, Willard, Woodman—55.

The question being on concurring in the amendment made in committee of the whole, to strike out "two" and insert "one,"

Mr. CHAPEL said, it is generally understood here that the delegates from Macomb county came here instructed to go for this thing. It is true we were instructed by a small knot of men, got together in the Court house; a promiscuous number instructed us to vote for single Senatorial districts; but I am opposed to it. I don't believe in the doctrine. I believe in extending the greatest good to the greatest number. I do not believe in tying the Senators down to single districts. I suppose the rule is to vote agreeably to instructions; and as there are a great many smart men in Macomb county that will want to know why I did not obey instructions, I feel disposed to state my reasons. It perhaps will not injure me. I cannot well be down, because I ask no favors from any party. I am independent of office, and the emoluments of office; but I would like to carry out the wishes of Macomb county.

I believe (said Mr. C.) to adopt the single Senatorial district system would be wrong. The interests of the party that have moved forward the car of democracy for the last sixty years, will be injured. That is the reason why I cannot give my vote for it. I believe it is wrong and anti-democratic. I shall wait and see. I believe if the Convention tie it down, that three years will not pass over before there will be more complaints and curses against those who tied it down, than against those who disregarded their instructions.

Mr. C. had become satisfied from the arguments of gentlemen, that Senators ought to be elected for a longer time and for a larger district than Representatives, and that the proposed single district system for Senators would work injuriously. Wayne, from her population, will be entitled to two Senators and have a large fraction; this will give her three—it will make her stronger. Macomb, with her eighteen thousand inhabitants, will have one, and a fragment unrepresented, unless county lines can be broke down. It will soon be discovered to be wrong, and the people will be desirous of backing out of it; but there will be no remedy; it is proposed to tie it up constitutionally, so that there will be no redress.

If (said Mr. C.) they would fix it so that the Legislature could change it if it proved injurious, I would go for it; as it is, I must go against it, instructions and all.

The amendment was concurred in:

Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Eastman, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Mason, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Sullivan, Tiffany, Van Valkenburg, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Williams, Willard, Woodman—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, J. Bartow, Beeson, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Crary, Desnoyers, Eaton, Gibson, Hanscom, Hart, Marvin, McClelland, McLeod, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sutherland, Town, Whittemore, President—30.

Section 3 was read, which provides for the enumeration of the inhabitants and the apportionment of Representatives.

The question being on concurring in the following amendment made in committee of the whole: "every organized county containing 2,000 white inhabitants shall be entitled to one Representative."

Mr. SUTHERLAND proposed the following as a substitute:

"Provided, that until the apportionment under the census of 1855, the counties of Saginaw, Tuscola, Midland, Sanilac, Newaygo and Montcalm shall each be entitled to at least one Representative; and all other counties now or hereafter to be organized, to at least one Representative each, whenever it shall contain 1,500 inhabitants."

Mr. S. said—Mr. President, I wish to say but one word on this subject. I expressed my views somewhat at length on a former occasion. Some objections were made to the proposition then offered, from the fact that some counties were organized with a few inhabitants, and that the expense would be too great to allow each county in the upper peninsula a representative; this amendment does away with those objections—none of the counties mentioned are in the upper peninsula—none of them with few inhabitants. Saginaw contains something like 4,000. The others from one to three thousand; and if not allowed a Representative now, they will be deprived till 1859. There are six counties mentioned in the amendment, which are rapidly increasing in population and in every respect; and they are entitled to, as I hope they will receive, some consideration in this Convention.

Mr. S. was glad to see a liberal feeling prevail in the Convention. In the old counties where they have a population equal to half of the ratio, they will be entitled to a member; on that ground they would be entitled to three Representatives. Under the new rule there would be injustice done. Before another apportionment, they would come up to the ratio of representation. He hoped that gentlemen, before they voted upon it, would investigate, and treat the northern counties with liberality.

Mr. WILLIAMS would inquire what Saginaw had been doing for the last fifteen years? How much had they increased since '35? they had a representative then.

Mr. SUTHERLAND stated that in 1845, the number of inhabitants was 1200. Judging from the vote, they have increased to 4000; that was some proof that it was a prolific region.

Mr. N. PIERCE thought the provision in the article was a liberal one. Sixty-four members must take about 7000 as the ratio. It gives the new counties a member on a population of 2000. This is liberal. He would not attach a member to a county until the amount of population was known.

Mr. LOVELL said, what the gentleman from Saginaw asks, is not more liberal than the provision in the present constitution, in relation to new counties. He did not know why this Convention should be less liberal than the Convention of '35. If they were wise, why should we be less wise? It is said the amendment made in committee of the whole, is liberal. It is so in one sense, for 2000 is not perhaps a third of what will entitle the people to a representative. But, sir, when can we come into the enjoyment of this excessive liberality. When will the census be taken upon which we can act?

Mr. CORNELL—It is being taken now.

Mr. LOVELL—The gentleman from Jackson says it is being taken now. Well, will the county of Montcalm, the only county in which I have a particular interest, have any advantage from it? Montcalm is attached to Ionia for judicial and representative purposes. Suppose they have a population of 1,900, a little short of 2,000, when will be the time that Montcalm will have a Representative? Not before 1859, unless the Convention regulates this matter.

I am not fully prepared to say I would adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Saginaw; but I am satisfied the amendment of the committee does not do justice to the people of the new counties.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, (28th day,) July 12.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

After the roll was called, Mr. BACKUS rose and said:—

I arise, Mr. President, as well in respect for public feeling, as of the better sympathies of our common nature, to the performance of a painful duty, in the formal announcement to this Convention, of the death of ZACHARY TAYLOR, President of the United States.

This event took place at Washington, on the evening of the 9th instant.

Sir, the inscrutable purposes of Providence in this afflictive dispensation, depriving the nation of its chief Executive Magistrate, at a juncture so big with events as the present, we can neither fathom nor fully comprehend.

The ebony wing of the Angel of Death is over the nation—her head is smitten—he has bowed to the mandate of Omnipotence, "thou shalt surely die"—he is numbered with the dead. But one thing, sir, we can do. Draw instructions from the admonitions of this Providence, that again admonishes us of man's mortality—that the great leveller of human distinction, Death, marks indiscriminately for his victim the high and low, the great and small; that even a nation's confidence cannot shield its possessor from the unerring shaft of death.

It teaches, too, with the same unerring certainty, that he who would be truly great must be truly good; that mortality can become immortal alone by virtues that shall leave an impress on society when the mortal man shall be numbered with the countless hosts of the forgotten dead.

In making this announcement, I shall, sir, be permitted to say, that not only the distinguished position, but the virtues of the man whose death it has been my duty to announce, challenge from us and the whole American people, deep sorrow for the national bereavement.

The death of the Chief Magistrate of a nation is at any time and to any people a sad disaster; to us, as a people, emphatically so. Not only from the peculiarly important matters that now engross the attention of our national councils, but also at all times from the very nature and organization of our form of government.

With us the sovereignty of the nation is invoked to select from its citizens him who is to guard and guide, as the Supreme Executive, the national destinies. None can exercise this delicate and responsible trust like him to whom the trust is directly confided. Before this fearful stroke of Providence, the rancor and commotion of partisan strife must sink back abashed, as seeing the hand of Him who doeth His pleasure in the armies of Heaven, as also among the nation of the earth. The better and nobler feelings of our nature will predominate, and all concur in one common sentiment to honor, in death, him, whom in life the millions of our republic have loved to honor.

This, sir, is not the time or place for me to pronounce the eulogium of the illustrious dead; our feelings at this time are too nearly allied to despondency to permit it. I shall, however, be permitted to say of his public services, in which almost from boyhood he has been engaged, his nation's banner has been borne by him in triumph, and untarnished through all the varied scenes of a soldier's life, with honor to himself and glory to his country. His life presents an example worthy of emulation to all who may follow him, as combining the stern tenets of war happily blended with the milder sympathies of a good man and magnanimous conqueror.

As a statesman, to which position the confidence of the American people in his integrity, by their free suffrage elevated him, he brought to the councils of the nation a heart uncontaminated with the tricks of political manœuverers, and bent firmly and alone on an unwavering purpose to do his duty; this part none will deny. He has nobly and constantly aimed to perform with a single purpose to the public good. He will go down to the grave with the proudest title that man can bear—the unanimous sentiment of a great nation that he was an honest man.

As a man, his elements of character, as illustrated in his life, were all such as we must ever praise and admire. To those who knew him personally, his memory, as was his life, will ever be endeared by all the most pure and holy ties that can bind man to man; he was but to be seen and known to be admired and beloved; of unflinching integrity, untarnished purity. He is dead. The Angel of Death has smitten the nation. His history will become that of the nation, who elevated him to the highest station within their gift. The present will with heartfelt sorrow lament him, posterity will do him honor—he was a great, because he was a good man.

I hope, Mr. President, in testimony of our respect, and a nation's grief, under this sudden national calamity, this Convention will now adjourn.

Whereupon, Mr. ROBERTS offered the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, a benignant and inscrutable Providence hath, in its wisdom, removed from the scenes of his usefulness and the great theatre of human action, a renowned warrior, a distinguished patriot, and a beloved statesman, General ZACHARY TAYLOR, the President of the United States; it is

Resolved, That this Convention, as a testimonial of their deep and profound respect for the memory of the deceased, and of their unaffected sorrow over this sudden bereavement to the Republic, will adopt the usual insignia of mourning.

Resolved, That this Convention do now adjourn over until to-morrow.

And the same were unanimously adopted. So the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, (29th day,) July 13.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. SANFORD.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. COOK: of John W. May and 81 others, citizens of Hillsdale county, asking that the new constitution may provide that the Legislature shall have no power of authorizing the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; also,

By Mr. GARDINER: two several petitions of 134 citizens of Washtenaw county, praying for a like provision.

Referred to select committee upon the subject.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: of E. C. White and 43 others of Centreville, St. Joseph county, relative to the right of suffrage.

Laid upon the table.

The Convention having reached the order of unfinished business, resumed the consideration of the article entitled "Legislative Department."

The question being upon Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment:

"Provided that until after the apportionment under the census of 1855, the counties of Saginaw, Tuscola, Midland, Sanilac, Newaygo and Montcalm, shall each be entitled to one Representative, and all other counties now or hereafter to be organized, to at least one Representative each, whenever it shall contain 1,500 inhabitants;"

Mr. BARTOW moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Representative," where it first occurs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND accepted the amendment.

The question was put, and very few members voting thereon, before the vote was declared by the chair,

Mr. BARTOW rose and said—I cannot suppose that the Convention will refuse this to the new counties. If all the facts were known, I think the vote of the Convention would be different. I shall feel called upon to ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. S. CLARK would like to know the number of inhabitants in the new counties, whether elections had or had not been held, &c.

Mr. BARTOW—The gentleman from Saginaw could more fully explain. I will give what information I possess. Tuscola has a population of 2,000, Midland 800, Sanilac 2,500. Respecting Montcalm, I am not prepared to make any statement. They are rapidly advancing in population and wealth. Under the first constitution, it was a question whether the new counties should be represented, except they had the same ratio as the old counties. It was, however, allowed; and it has been universally conceded that the State never made so good an investment. It induces a settlement of the country—it assures them that they are not beyond the reach of humanity; that they will have the privilege of representing their own rights and their own interests.

It has been almost as beneficial to the older counties as the county thus allowed to be represented. You have in the representative a knowledge of the population, the resources, the wealth of each county. That, of itself, would be sufficient to pay the expense. Again, the expense of a member for forty days, and that once in two years, will not be much. He will give as much value in the shape of information, as the State will pay him for his services.

But the chief recommendation is that it induces settlements. Gentlemen will bear me out in saying that there is not better land in the State of Michigan; and I consider that it is of the highest importance to this State to encourage the new settlements by every means in their power.

I cannot conceive any good ground for a single negative vote upon this proposition; and, I doubt not, the good sense of this Convention will agree with me in this matter.

Mr. CHURCH—Information, sir, has been asked for respecting the counties enumerated in the amendment under consideration, and I propose to furnish a little respecting one of them. The county of Newaygo, sir, lies north of the county which I in part represent, and embraces, in connexion with the adjacent county of Oceana, the principal portion of country commonly called Muskegon. A river by the latter name runs through it, the course of which is nearly parallel with the Grand River; a river of less length indeed than the Grand River, and of less average width perhaps, but discharging quite an equal amount of water, the Rapids of which furnish an immense water-power, and which intersects a region of great fertility of soil, and also containing extensive and valuable pine-ries.

This county now furnishes a large annual supply of lumber for the markets upon the west side of Lake Michigan; the transportation of which maintains now a respectable and rapidly augmenting marine. The harbor, at the mouth of the Muskegon River, is rated as the second best upon the Michigan side of the Lake; being upon the lee-coast, and consisting of a lake about seven miles in length by two in width, of a sufficient depth of water to float the vessels navigating the main lakes. The small lake is connected with the main lake by an outlet sometimes barred by the sand accumulated by the action of wind and wave; but the contemplated improvements by the general government will remove this obstacle. The erection of a Lighthouse has been determined upon at that point, and liberal appropriations for the improvements spoken of are recommended by the surveying parties detailed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the examination of the east coast of Lake Michigan.

Of the population of this district I cannot speak positively. Large additions have been made the past year to the agriculturists; a demand existing for their products on account of the numerous mills in operation upon the river, and the people and teams employed about them. I should think that the population must now crowd upon one thousand; and taking into account those who are scattered along the Lake shore, perhaps it will exceed two thousand.

But, sir, the position of this district entitles it to one Representative in the Legislature, because, unless furnished with one from its own territory, it must go virtually unrepresented. The Representative from Kent county cannot take care of it. The inhabited and active part of Newaygo is separated from us by a belt of heavy timber, on each side of which the immigration deposits itself; a natural barrier thus being placed against an easy and intimate connexion. Our interests are rival. I do not indeed admit, that to a statesmanlike mind, there is any real rivalry between parts of this State, save a generous competition in progress and improvement. Yet such language is used, and oftentimes such a course is pursued as indicates a rivalry between districts contiguous and engaged in similar pursuits. There would be a call for legislative favors, and one or the other would be likely to denounce the bestowment of these favors as partial. Last winter a law was passed providing for the appointment of commissioners to locate the county seat of Newaygo. But, upon examination of the late session laws, I find the county has not been organized. This fact shows how careless has been the legislation respecting her. She cannot depend upon Representatives from other counties to take care of her. A man from herself, and full of regard for home and home interests, must be had. I ask this Convention to secure to an interesting and valuable section of the State, this boon. She will amply repay you for the favor in her immediate contribution to your treasury, from the persons and property your mark of attention and encouragement will roll within her borders. I care not much how you modify this section, if it, in any and every shape, gives a Representative to Newaygo. That is my sine qua non; Newaygo is my pole-star; throughout this debate I have held her up as a guide—willing to come out any where, and with any body, if Newaygo gets a Representative.

Mr. CRARY moved to amend the amendment made in committee, by striking out the words "containing 2,000 white inhabitants," and inserting in lieu thereof, the words "at the time of the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. C. said, we have said in section 5, that no county shall be divided, and we must suppose that the smaller counties are similarly attached to their county lines. There is, in fact, a greater reason why they should be represented, as there is a greater amount of territory, and much information to be acquired respecting the various interests of the county.

We have conferred upon each county certain legislative powers. It is, then, proper that each county that is organized should be represented. I care not whether it has a population of 1,000 or 6,000, when a Legislature thinks it proper that a county should be entitled to a separate organization, it should be entitled to a Representative; it should come here and speak for itself.

It is said that you give representation to the woods, and rocks and rivers. Be it so, for we are not proceeding entirely upon the principle of representation by numbers. We are, by the single district system, disfranchising all the fraction that is above a certain ratio. If we adhere to the principle of single districts, confined to county lines, to a certain extent we deny the principle of representation based upon numbers alone.

A new county has more need of local legislation than an old one. We must legislate for the new sections of the State, or bye and bye our political calculations will come to naught.

I wish so to provide in this Constitution that the new counties may have a common interest with the rest. I wish the same liberality to be extended that was shown in the last Convention. Then, St. Clair, Branch, Hillsdale, Livingston, and several counties north, all came in with a population below the ratio. Chippewa came in with a population of 300. Has the State ever suffered by that act? No sir, and yet Chippewa has had a Representative for 15 years, and never yet has had a population equal to the ratio. The numbers may be small, but there is an immense territory; but that is woods, and rocks, and trees, and not population.

I will venture the assertion, that but for this representation, the copper country never would have been known to this day, and all the interest that we feel toward that country would have been lost, for we should not have known it. It was the knowledge which came from there which led to the discovery of the resources of the country, showing that it was all that we could desire as a country, in its mineral resources, its timber and its fisheries. Just as long as we vote to retain the county lines and keep a county organization, so long shall I vote and wish the new counties to have a Representative, believing that the county lines are as dear to them as they are to us. Again, it is utterly impossible for one individual to represent the interests of another county, in addition to his own. We should have, in the Grand Traverse, a county detached from any other at least 150 miles; and yet it would so happen if this is so decided. We are bound to take care of the Upper Peninsula, and it is our interest to give it a full, and more than a full representation. Their interests are so disconnected, that we should give them Representatives in order to have an account of the wealth and resources of that portion of the State. Except you do this, you may have a State—a State government—a State law—and you may have 22,000 people in direct rebellion against your authority; not only in interest, but in feeling. They will think that all their interests are different from yours. Give them a voice, whether few or many, and you will bring about a concurrence of feeling which may continue until they become a State of their own. We are bound to take care of it until it can take care of itself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend by inserting "with the territory thereto attached."

Mr. B. said—I have listened to the argument of the gentleman from Calhoun, and with respect to the disfranchisement of part of the county, I must correct him, as it is the rule that an additional Senator and Representative is given when the county has more than half the ratio. I have been a resident of new counties for nearly twenty-four years; and I should know something of their wants and wishes. Why should a Representative be sent from every organized county? For what purpose is it organized? Sir, it has no reference to township organizations; it is simply to enable you to introduce courts, and erect legal tribunals in the county. What does my amendment propose, and what evil would the people suffer from the rule, if adopted? Let us suppose that the common ratio is 5,000; this amendment would extend to such portions containing 2,000, all the privileges that others have, that contain 5,000. Is that not enough? Is it not justice, and more than justice?

The gentleman asks if the delegate from Ionia can represent them? I answer that he can. It is simply the question, whether he is to represent sixteen or thirty-two square townships? Their wants and wishes must be nearly similar. I do not wish them attached to the old counties, because the Representatives of the old counties have not a knowledge of the wants of the new counties; but if territory be attached to new counties, they will be well provided for, because Representatives from new counties will be well acquainted with the wants of new settlements, and responsible to the electors of a new county. I, at an early day, represented that portion of Michigan lying west of Lenawee, and my postage exceeded that of all the other members of the Legislature; yet it was not complained that their wants were not attended to, nor did I find that I could not obtain all the attention to which I was entitled. And I must confess that the members from the old counties were so kind and attentive to the wishes of the new counties, it was only necessary to present the wants of my constituency in a proper manner.

What is the proposition? It is, that when a new county, with such territory as shall be thereto attached, shall have 2,000 inhabitants, they shall have a Representative to attend to their interests; leaving to the Legislature the power of attaching the territory in such manner as may be best to the interests of the new settlements.

What kind of a population inhabit these new counties? Are they all electors—citizens of the United States? No sir. A large portion of their population is a foreign population, whom this Convention have decided not to admit to the privileges of electors until they become naturalized citizens, which must take five years. Now, it is easy to perceive that if the present proposition is adhered to, a very few electors will be able to send a Representative. This cannot be denied; and certainly the present ratio is at least fair and just toward the new counties.

Mr. BUSH—I am in favor of giving each county that may be organized at the time of the adoption of this constitution, at least one Representative; and am in favor of making liberal provisions for such counties as may hereafter be organized, with the territory thereto attached.

Gentlemen have opposed this provision as detrimental to the interests of the old counties, and as a violation of a well settled principle, to wit: that representation in all cases should be based upon population. Now, sir, I deny that the interest of the old counties would be jeopardized in the least by this liberal provision. A large amount of the territory of this State is yet in the hands of the general government, and to us, as a State, at present entirely worthless. We cannot tax or touch it. We highly prize it, and exultingly look forward to the time when it shall be subdued and settled, and thus create such a basis of taxation as will make the burdens of government in Michigan as light as that of any other State. Are not the old counties interested in this as well as the new? Should it not, then, be our common object to give the pioneers who break into the forest and prepare the way for the future development of the resources thereof, a voice at the earliest practicable period in the councils of our State? Will not the information that he brings and communicates do more to increase the settlement of the county than any one thing? And are not the real necessities of a new county, in order to obtain a full development of her resources, greater than those of an old county?

Wayne county could to-day represent

Oakland better than the county of Kent can Newaygo; and Oakland and Wayne could either be as well protected without a representation as a number of the new counties, for this reason: Wayne and Oakland are well known throughout the State, and their necessities are known; but the new counties are not generally known, and without a Representative from their own territory, acquainted with the circumstances and responsible to the citizens, her wants and necessities cannot be administered to, and her interests fully protected. But gentlemen contend that these new counties, being attached to others for representative purposes, are fully represented. Let us take up the map of the State and examine this subject. I propose first to take Newaygo. It is represented with Kent. Grand River runs through Kent county; Muskegon River through Newaygo. They both are important auxiliaries in getting the surplus of the country upon the waters of Lake Michigan, and their interests to-day are rival, and that rivalry must continue from the very nature of things. One man cannot represent both satisfactorily.

Next, I take Montcalm. She is represented with Ionia; Flat river runs through Montcalm, and empties into Grand river, below the county of Ionia; the same rivalry there exists, but to a less extent. The same is true with Midland, Saginaw and Tuscola. Sanilac is situated on Lake Huron, with her own port, and is represented with St. Clair, who has a rival point upon the lake. All these counties to-day have vast interests, rapidly increasing, with from 500 to 3,000 inhabitants each; and unless provision is made in this constitution for their separate representation, they will not obtain it until 1859. The next ratio of representation will be about 7,000, based upon the census now being taken; it is not probable that either of the newly organized counties will have a moiety of that number. The State census will be taken in 1855. This Convention have decided on biennial sessions of the Legislature. The session of 1857 will apportion anew the State upon the census of 1855, and the first Representatives that will meet in the council of the State from any of those new counties will be at the session of 1859. When we look back at the history of this State for the last fifteen years, and see the great increase that has taken place in our resources and population, when we consider the fact that twenty delegates are now in this Convention from territory that was unorganized and but little known, and not represented in the Convention of 1835, are we prepared to place the period nine years in the future when counties now organized, with important interests, shall be first represented; though the gentleman from Berrien tells us the inhabitants of the new counties are foreigners;—carrying the idea that they should not be represented.

Mr. BRITAIN (interposing) wished to correct the statement of the gentleman from Ingham. He had not said so.

Mr. BUSH—Well sir, the gentleman asks, what is the character of the inhabitants of these new counties? They are not citizens, he says; clearly conveying the idea that they are aliens; which may be true, and is to a certain extent; but what county is there in this State that the citizen and aliens do not co-operate and mingle together; they are interspersed throughout the State, and as fast as time will permit they are becoming one people. They do not remain aliens and strangers in this country, but become active and responsible citizens. We need not be skilled in prophetic vision, and look away in the future, to see them assimilate to our people and become thoroughly Americanized. This is our common observation; and will we not extend to them, when they first settle our forests, every privilege consistent with the enlarged principles of our government?

I likewise deny that it is, as has been asserted, a cardinal principle of our government, that representation should be based upon population. Population has been made use of as an approximation towards the basis of representation. In the government of the United States the House of Representatives is based upon population; but the sovereignty of each State is represented in the Senate, which is the only check that the small States have against the encroachments of the large and populous ones, and without which the Union could not exist. This was fully illustrated in the government of Ancient Greece. The power of the strong States continually encroached upon the weak, and there being no check in the government, the "tug of war" came. I do not present this historical truth as a parallel to the one now under discussion, but to show that representation based upon population alone, has been tried and failed.

The gentleman from Berrien tells us that the new counties can be well represented by the old ones to which they are or happen to be attached; that he once represented a very large territory, and most successfully. This may have been possible; but I assure the gentleman he has been more fortunate than most men. In 1841 Congress granted to the State of Michigan 500,000 acres of land. By the language of the grant it was donated to be used in building roads and bridges, and draining swamps, &c., advocated by its friends upon the ground that those improvements being made in the vicinity of the land selected, would enhance the value and make saleable the balance of the public lands; thus that the U. S. government, as a land holder, was interested. But, sir, I look back at our Legislative magnanimity to the new counties, and find that, notwithstanding the act of Congress defining the object of the appropriation, those lands, though selected exclusively in the new counties, and most of them in the unrepresented counties, have been used in building railroads in the first and second tier of counties from the south line of the State; and for other improvements, with a few exceptions, far south of the point where they were selected. I ask the gentleman from Berrien, if the interests of those counties were fully protected, when those lands were almost exclusively appropriated in a distant portion of the State.

As yet, we have heard little complaint, though silence is not always a faithful monitor of content. An opportunity is now presented in this revision of the constitution, to do justice to those new counties—those political organizations that have a right, according to the spirit and genius of our government, to a voice in the councils of the State. The delegates in the old counties have the power to withhold this right; but is it policy in this, the infancy of our State, when our population is almost wholly confined to three tier of counties, from the south line of the State, not embracing one quarter of the whole territory, with all the natural resources necessary to sustain thirty times our present population, without the slightest inconvenience? I think not—I trust not. Let that liberality that has characterized the present age, especially the State of Michigan in the formation of the constitution of 1835, continue; then, one Representative was given to each organized county, and liberal provision made for the future. A great change has taken place in the public mind in this country, since that time, in favor of popular government—in favor of liberal principles. Let our action upon this important subject, be equal to the liberality of the times, and we shall adopt the amendment.

Mr. HANSCOM—Since this question first came up, I have given to it all the attention that I could; and the more I reflected, the more I became convinced that it is our duty to give to every organized county at least one Representative. True policy requires it, and the best interests of the State alike demand this action at the hands of the Convention. The experience of the last fifteen years furnishes a good reason for it. The system has worked well; has been found useful. Every argument has been used that need be. I feel so deeply on the subject, that although I come from an old county, I would rather forego one Representative than see the small counties disfranchised.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I cannot see the propriety of giving Representatives where there is no population. One principle should be adopted—that representation should go with population as far as practicable. It is said that one man can represent a large county containing 30,000 people, as well as he can represent a smaller one. Yet, what should we think if the committee brought in a bill to that effect? Sir, the argument is not consistent. If men have rights according to their numbers, those rights should be respected. Representation cannot be made exact, but it can be made nearly so.

My friend from Calhoun said that large portions would not be actually represented in the old counties. His ideas are wrong, or mine are. The county of Calhoun has always had one Senator; and having one she has had but half of one, as he represents districts attached. If we had a Senator to represent ourselves alone, although we had more than a ratio, we should be better protected. We should elect a man that, by giving his whole attention to our wants, would suit us better.

Mr. CRARY—It is proposed to have 32 Senators. If the county of Calhoun had a population of 50,000, and the entire population of the State was one and one-half million, it would leave unrepresented in the county of Calhoun a fraction of 20,000.

Mr. N. PIERCE—Turn the question. When we have a population of 50,000, and the ratio is 30,000, by the plan pursued of allowing another member when we have more than half the ratio, we should have sometimes more than our proportion, and sometimes less.

But I would rather have one Senator elected for the county than two from a double district. It is necessary to fix some bounds—arrange some system. If we adopt the plan of having 64 Representatives, with a population of 450,000, and give the new counties 8 or 10 Representatives, it would increase the ratio from 5,000 to nearly 8,000. Whilst we shall require 8,000, Tuscola will be entitled to one Representative when she has 2000 inhabitants. What is the force of the argument about the county lines? One man might as well represent several new counties as one that was more settled. I hold that we should show a spirit of liberality to the new counties, but I do not see the propriety of giving a Representative to one county, with a population of 300, when it requires in another a population of 8,000. I have no apprehensions that the old counties will oppress the small ones; they have always helped them. It is certainly their wish to see the new counties settled; but, how will giving them a Representative help to settle the county? It is the nature of the country—its fertility—that makes population. Delegates upon this floor represent territory that is out of their county, and represent it well. It is the policy of Europe to represent otherwise than by members, but it is not our policy; we should always base it upon population. We are told that some towns in the new counties have a population of 1,000; if so, others probably have from 500 to 600; they would then come under the rule; if they do not, they can still join with others and be represented. If they allow the new four times less than the old counties, it is as much as they ought to expect; and I do not wish to see the amendment stricken out.

Mr. CORNELL—I am aware this is a difficult subject to act upon in this Convention; it always has been difficult. If men in the Legislature have ever been corrupted, it has been upon this subject; that is, the apportionment and the subjects connected with it. It will operate unequally, do the best that you can. We have rules laid down with regard to population, but if we adopt the single district system, it would still be unequal. We should connect territory as well as population in our representation.

I am in favor of giving all the newly organized counties a Representative; it can be done without injustice to others; they should have it. I have heard some ingenious arguments against the proposition, but they have had but little weight upon my mind. If you elect a Representative to the Legislature from a town or county, all other interests being equal, he will go in favor of his own town or county, and confine himself within the lines. That should not be so. He should take into consideration the interests of the whole State. If a question is presented of local advantage, but injurious to other portions, it should be abandoned. But while this is not the case, it becomes necessary that the several portions of the State shall be fully represented. If a new county has not the ratio of population, it needs the more the fostering care of the State; for it cannot be supposed that an individual living in one county can represent another county; that he can be acquainted with their wants. It is not possible. Therefore, I am in favor of electing the individual among the people whom he represents.

I am in favor of the single district system, but there will in that case be fractions that will be unrepresented. There is an objection to it; it will be found so. There will be fault found with it, so much so that I have fears that the constitution may not be received so favorably.

The member from Berrien remarked that several of the new counties were becoming settled by foreign population, and according to a rule they could not vote for a certain length of time; and the reason is that they are not competent; that they might abuse the privilege. Many of us may abuse the privilege, and yet we think ourselves competent. What is the object of inviting this foreign population? It is to improve the State—make it more wealthy—bring here a wholesome population. If that is the object, shall we shut them out, say that they shall not vote, or know any thing about the operations of our government? They can only know theoretically, and we know but little except by practice. We ought to give them a Representative; for, even if they are not allowed to vote, they will become acquainted with the workings of the government; and it is our duty, the duty of the State, to protect them by representation.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—I deem this subject of representation an important matter. Our action will affect the general interests of the State. It was said of old time, that "the glory of a king consisted in the multitude of his people." I may add that the glory of a State consists in the multitude of its people. No one can doubt this. Whatever measure, therefore, shall tend to advance the settlement of the new counties and increase their population, will receive my cordial support. Every such advance and increase adds to the taxable inhabitants and property of the State, and to its wealth and power.

Three-fourths of our State is at present uninhabited. Shall we adopt a policy that will have a tendency to continue it so, or by a liberal policy extend the borders of our settlements and increase our numbers? Giving to each new county a Representative will have a tendency to bring it into notice; thereby its resources may be developed and its settlement be promoted. No one can doubt this. The new counties more especially need to be represented. This all must admit.

It is urged that the admission of new counties to a representation before their population reaches the established ratio, will induce the new counties to press for an organization before they shall be fairly entitled to it. But they cannot be organized without the action of the Legislature. And the fact that every new county is to have a representation, will be a sufficient guard against premature organization.

It is said that population should be the basis of representation. Some urge it as the sole basis. This has never been carried out in full. In the government of the Union, the House of Representatives is based, as near as may be, upon population; in the Senate it is otherwise. There the Senators of the States are equal. The Senators from Rhode Island are equal to those from New York. Here a different rule obtains. In the Senate of our State the new counties can have no representation of any importance. But in the House they can, and should be represented. The counties are organized communities; and this rule of representation should obtain. If it does take a few Representatives from the older counties, they will still be able to take care of themselves. The power will still be in their hands. They can afford to be liberal. Suppose it should bring in some ten members from new counties—what then? It is far better that fifteen should come in than that the new counties should not be represented. The knowledge, the information to be derived from that representation will be worth more than all that it will cost.

Mr. S. CLARK would like to know the number of organized counties in the State, or that will be at the time of the adoption of this constitution. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. CRARY] knows all about it; and I want him to give to this Convention this information.

Mr. CRARY could not give the information.

Mr. WALKER—In fixing the basis of representation, the course of argument has demonstrated the necessity of having a Representative for every organized county in the State. One rises, and another, and says that he is wholly ignorant of the subject; and the reason is, that they are not represented in this Convention. If they were, we should come into the possession of these facts.

I confess that I am laboring under the same ignorance with others—that I cannot give a statement of the number of the new counties, or the number of their population. Will there be so much inequality of influence if you allow a Representative to each organized county? Would there be so much difference in the actual result? The counties of Wayne and Oakland would always have a commanding influence, from the talent they would be able to send, although they sent but a single representative; and it might have more effect than at present, coming with a divided delegation, as they sometimes do.

We should have regard to the interests of the State in the northern region. Our southern border is densely populated; but the emigration is tending to the north, and it will for the next fifteen years increase yet more rapidly. We shall say that these emigrants shall not be represented for five years, if we adhere rigidly to the rule of a ratio; for although a new county fills up rapidly, yet it will compel them to wait for another census before they can be represented.

In some of the New England States they have a more unequal representation than this at this day. In Connecticut the old towns take precedence of the new towns. The old towns send two members; but all the towns organized after a certain date, send only one; and this, although the population of some of the new towns are double those of the old ones; and in different States a principle has been adopted, in different ways, that the ratio of population shall not be the sole basis. Regard should be had to the prospective interests of the State. Every organized county should have a Representative to inform us of its wants and wishes, and to explain to us the feelings of the people. There may be occasionally a man who can represent the bounds of a constituency, as mentioned by my friend from Mackinaw—the Aurora Borealis on the one hand, and something equally extensive on the other; but these instances must be rare. We must bear in mind that there are rival interests springing up in the lower peninsula with regard to different towns and the course of trade.

Mr. FRALICK—The question has assumed a singular shape. I thought that the first proposition was liberal. I voted in the committee for 3,000, but the committee thought it best to say 2,000; I dissented, and thought we had gone far enough at 3,000. I think that it is now extremely liberal. But gentlemen tell us that representation should not be based upon population; while the other day, when the single Senatorial district system was under discussion, they talked in quite a different strain. Gentlemen have found a new light. Is it because they think that they are going to be benefitted by taking the other side of the question? I think that a county should not be organized until it has at least 2,000 inhabitants; until that time, they will not be able to support a separate county government; for, according to the rate of population, there will be but about 350 tax payers, besides non-residents.

What is the amendment? To give to every organized county a Representative upon this floor. What then shall be done with the counties that are not yet organized? Shall we admit them upon organization, or compel them to wait until they have a full ratio, which will be from 6,000 to 8,000. I am opposed to the principle altogether, of changing the basis of representation from population to territory, especially in the popular branch. If we give the new counties that are now organized a representation not based on population, it should extend to those organized hereafter; because, those organized now, have no greater claims upon us than those hereafter to be organized.

I will correct one mistake that has been made here. Some of the counties that were received at the adoption of the present constitution had other territory attached to them—or some of them—for representative purposes. If this system is adopted, let us examine for a moment how the rights of persons and the people of the State may be prejudiced: Twenty ambitious men in a new county may combine and arrange their plans for self-aggrandizement, and to the detriment of the best interests of the new county, to wit: One man shall go to the Legislature; the others to have the profits and fill the offices of the new county; they together besiege the Legislature, and through misrepresentation or otherwise, will obtain a paper organization, and they will heavily tax the non-residents for their support; and justice, equality and the rights that should be exercised to the non-residents, would be violated; therefore, I think the principle is wrong. It is said the large counties will oppress and take away the rights of new or small counties. I do not think this is the fact, or that the history of legislation in this State will sustain the assertion. A large portion of the expenses of the State is incurred by the legislation necessary for the new counties; and the old counties have invariably been generous and liberal in their legislation for the new counties; they have devoted the time of the Legislature and the treasury of the State in bringing out the resources and protecting the rights and interests of the new counties. I think that no county should be represented simply because they have sufficient territory, or a county organization; but that there should be fixed by the constitution a liberal scale or ratio of population, under which each new organized county would be entitled to one Representative; but in my opinion, a moiety of the general ratio would be liberal, and should be required.

Mr. MORRISON asked for a division of the question on Mr. CRARY's proposition.

Mr. M. said—I am in favor of the proposition to strike out, but not in favor of that proposed to be inserted. If the proposition to strike out prevails, the section will then stand so that every organized county will be entitled to a Representative in the Legislature of the State. I concur in the justness of the remark made by the gentleman from Wayne, that if the motion to insert should prevail, it would operate unfairly towards the counties hereafter to be organized; and that is the reason why I call for a division of the question.

I am in favor of extending to the counties that may be hereafter organized the same privileges of representation that we are disposed to grant to those organized at the time of the adoption of this constitution, and shall vote accordingly; and hope that every member of the Convention will feel the justice and propriety of so doing, and vote in a similar manner. We are called upon to act rightly and consistently, not only in regard to the present but in regard to the future, having in view the best interest of the State at large.

Should we make population the sole basis of representation, a large and valuable portion of the State would not be represented directly in our halls of legislation. I would ask if it would not be for the interest, not only of the State at large, but of the more populous counties, to permit every county that the Legislature may deem expedient to organize, to be represented directly in one branch of the Legislature? It is my opinion that it would; and my reasons for forming that opinion are, that the larger portion of the State is unsettled and its resources undeveloped; and its situation is such that it must settle slowly, and a long period elapse before those resources can be fully developed. And in case that we require the same ratio of representation in the sparsely settled portion of the State that we do in the more populous portion of it, the result would be, in the northern counties, that one individual would represent an extent of territory a portion of which he would know but little about—its fertility or capacity for improvement. But if every organized county, when organized, should be entitled to send a Representative, without reference to the number of its inhabitants, that Representative would be enabled to give accurate information in regard to the locality which he represents, and would be responsible, not only to his immediate constituents, but to the people of the State, for the correctness of that information. And information thus obtained would induce many to settle in the northern portion of the State who would not do so were it not for that information; and all must admit that the interest of the older counties is directly connected with the settlement of the newer ones, and that every additional settlement therein will increase the total valuation of the taxable property of the State, thereby lessening the burdens heretofore almost entirely borne by the older counties in the support of the State government.

It has been remarked by gentlemen that by extending so liberal a representation to the new counties, that it would lessen the representation of the older counties in such manner as to be detrimental to their interests; but this may be obviated by increasing the number of Representatives. The article now provides that the number of Representatives shall not exceed one hundred; by striking out this provision and leaving the future arrangement of the number to the Legislature, so as to be increased as they may think proper, would obviate in a measure the objections urged against the proposition.

Yet, I am so well convinced that it is for the interest of the State, as a State, to have every organized county—even if its population should not exceed 200—represented by some person residing therein, in one branch of the Legislature, that I would vote for the proposition, although in some respects it might seem to operate prejudicially to the older counties.

It has been urged that the new counties will have, according to the present provisions of the Legislative Article, more than their proportion of representation in the Senate. This can be easily obviated by striking out the clause which provides "that in the formation of Senate districts no county shall be divided, unless it shall be equitably entitled to two or more Senators." If this provision should be dispensed with, those counties having a population exceeding the ratio required in the formation of a Senate district, could be divided, and a portion attached to a portion of another county similarly situated, or to a county not having a population equal to the ratio required.

Mr. LOVELL offered the following substitute:

Provided, That each organized county shall be entitled to at least one Representative; and that each county hereafter organized, shall be entitled to a separate Representative, when it shall have obtained a population equal to a moiety of the ratio of representation hereafter established; and that each county having said ratio and a fraction over, equal to a moiety of said ratio, shall be entitled to two Representatives; and so on above that number; giving one additional member for each additional ratio.

This (said Mr. L.) is no new principle. It was adopted in 1835. This permits to a county that is hereafter organized, a Representative, when it has a moiety of a ratio. I believe that every county hereafter organized, is entitled to a representative before it has a full ratio. The principle is not only established in this State, but in others. The State of Mississippi gives a Representative not only to the counties organized, but to those hereafter to be so.

I do not come here for crimination or re-crimination; but I have had some ideas presented to my mind about which I wish to give my opinion. Some gentlemen, one would suppose from their actions, think that the State of Michigan consists of one or two tier of counties. We have two rail roads, one passing through the second tier, and it is termed the Central Rail Road; and yet where we are assembled we are but little more than seventy miles from the southern line of the State; while on the north our extent is almost boundless, embracing as it does the upper peninsula.

One gentleman has told us how the old counties love the new ones. Well, words are cheap—actions only tell. The new portions of the State are in the power of two tier of counties. If a person has me in his power and uses me rightly, he is entitled to credit for it—if he does not, I have a right to complain. The counties who have the power can afford to be generous as well as just. Look at the five million loan. Whose votes created it? whose votes divided it? The two southern tier of counties. What disposition was made of the money? True, there was an appropriation made in the Grand River valley; but the money spent, instead of being a benefit, was a positive injury. Thus, while every dollar remains a tax upon the old and the new counties, we have not had from it a local benefit of one dollar. One would have supposed that a portion of the internal improvement fund would have gone to improve our streams, and make our wagon roads; but it did not to any extent; the money was chiefly spent for their own purposes.

Since we have been here, we have been told that we were out of the world—that we must adjourn to Detroit or Marshall. I for one wished to place them for once in this position, that they might say, that members might be better able to appreciate the toil and the lot of those who have to spend, not the month of a session of a Convention, but the period of their whole lives, in a situation members find so hard to bear for a short time. Every town in the State of Vermont has a representative, let its numbers be what they may. Most of the south-west States have adopted the principle; not alone whig States, but democratic—where the star of democracy arose in splendor, and will doubtless go down in great brightness.

“Farewell, vain world begone,”—

The substitute I have offered embraces another principle. Montcalm will be entitled to a representative. There will be people in the north bye and bye, and a county will be laid out and attached north of Montcalm. Well, a person may receive a majority of all the electors in Montcalm, while another might receive a majority in Montcalm and the territory attached. A question may arise. The Legislature, it might be said, had transcended their powers. It seems to me that a provision of this sort should be established, for I can see no consistency in giving to one and denying another. It is left for the judgment of the Convention to decide what proportion the moiety shall bear to the ratio. They might say one-half or two-thirds.

I have examined the Constitutions of the south-western States, and there is not one provision that has not received the sanction of more States than one. There is nothing original. I do not claim it as being original. If it has merit it is simply as a combination of different parts of constitutions that have been adopted in the States of the Union. In relation to the 2000 white inhabitants, it will operate unjustly. Just as the Convention fixes it, so it must remain. Well, Montcalm will not have at present quite the number necessary for a representative. When will she be represented? Not, sir, before the year 1859. The census will be taken in 1855; we shall have biennial sessions—that would be the earliest moment, and it would be unjust; for long before that time she will be entitled to a Representative according to a ratio, and during that time her interests must suffer. I thought it my duty, sir, as a resident of a new county, so fully to present my views.

Mr. FRALICK—I rise to correct the statement of the gentleman. The State of Iowa and the State of Wisconsin have not adopted the principle.

Mr. LOVELL—The constitutions of the south-western States indicate that there is a different principle applied than population alone, to entitle to representation; and you will find in their constitutions principles engrafted which will bear out my assertion.

Mr. WILLIAMS said—While we have duties to perform to the new counties, we have duties also towards our constituents to regard. Claims are presented here in behalf of six new counties in the lower peninsula, for representation; and although the vague statements made here, fall far short of entitling them to the representation demanded, still if these vague statements could be substantiated he was willing to concede. In regard to Newaygo, he had independent reasons for believing the gentleman [Mr. CHURCH] from Kent was correct. From Grand River north, even to Grand Traverse Bay, the lumber trade was already important, and must rapidly increase. He thought that Newaygo and the counties west and north were equitably entitled to a representative. But in regard to the other counties we are left in the dark. It is said Midland contains 800 people. If so, there is no impropriety, no hardship in attaching Midland to Saginaw for representative purposes. Yet, still he thought he would give even a Representative to Midland, if conclusive proof is afforded that she contains 800 people. Here we are, one hundred delegates from the whole State. We are in the building which contains the archives of the State, and here, if anywhere, the evidence can be furnished relative to these counties. How many people does each contain? How many towns are organized? How many votes were cast at the last election? How many scholars have been returned? How much tax has been paid into the treasury? He doubted whether much more was paid into the State treasury than enough to satisfy the per diem and mileage of the members demanded. Now, let us have some evidence on all these points. Let us not vote blindly. Although he believed that one Representative from the densely settled portions of the State represented more interests, more people, more voters, yet still, if the assertions made were substantiated, he would vote to give them all six of the Representatives claimed. But, before voting, he would like to see the whole subject presented. There were some six counties in the Upper Peninsula. The mileage alone of six members from the upper country will be $1,500. My constituents in St. Joseph must contribute to pay this mileage; and yet no evidence is presented that they altogether pay one quarter as much into the treasury as St. Joseph alone. Now, if it is otherwise, show it. Let us have the facts as demanded relative to the lower counties, in regard to towns, voters, taxes and interests. If no facts were offered, the Convention were bound to consider that they could not be adduced. Of one fact we should be sure—that every member must be paid $250 mileage, at present rates of mileage. Now, with due respect to the gentleman from Chippewa, (Mr. ROBERTS,) he would like to know what he wanted for the Upper Peninsula? For himself, he could not vote for a proposition so gross as to give every county now and hereafter to be organized, a Representative. We should have them manufactured too fast. This plan was a mere bounty to adventurers to hasten the organization of counties. Depend upon it, no county will ever be so new as to be destitute of men who seek to live by their wits, rather than by work. Plenty of men will be found who seek aggrandizement in a little way. This man wants to be Representative—this man, sheriff—this man, clerk. Offer them a bounty to organize counties, and your legislative halls may be filled with Representatives without constituents. On this account, I would cheerfully vote for the limit fixed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ionia, [Mr. LOVELL,] that after the constitution was in operation, each new county should be entitled to a Representative, when it contained inhabitants equal to a moiety of the ratio of representation. This was just—this was democratic.

He was disposed to be more than liberal; but he did insist that before a vote was blindly taken, the questions he had propounded relative to all the counties in both peninsulas, should be answered, the facts furnished fully and frankly; otherwise, we could not decide this question intelligently or justly.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—They have paid into the treasury of the State $4,500; that is one fact; that has been paid for one purpose—for the privilege of digging out what the God of Nature has put there.

Mr. WILLIAMS—That is a fact worth mentioning. I have no doubt that the lumber trade, and the fisheries, and the copper, are valuable. Let us know what we are are voting for; let us have facts.

Mr. ROBERTS hoped that the Upper Peninsula would for the present be let alone. A committee will soon be able to make a report; and when that report is made, we will tell the people our wishes, our wants, and our resources.

Mr. HANSCOM offered a substitute, as follows:

"Each county (with the territory there-to attached for representative purposes) organized at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall have at least one member in the House of Representatives."

Mr. H. said—I find that we shall increase the number of Representatives but little; 2,000, I think, is a fair limit. When a new county has a population of 2,000 it should be represented. We propose by the constitution to make each county a sort of sovereignty; to vest with them the power of local legislation; conferring upon them great powers. That being the fact, is it not necessary that the sovereignty that we are permitting by the terms of this constitution should have the right to be heard. Sir, we do not go as far as the old constitution of 1835. They not only gave the organized counties a member, but by combining two or three unorganized counties together, gave them a member likewise. They provided that they should be thus attached, and that those hereafter organized should be represented. What is the force of the objection that is made about the expenses? That must be a small matter of consideration. A member's expenses will not be much, and the expenses of travel are reduced to the lowest rate that will enable him to travel to and from home. He remains twenty days per annum; and I would ask, what is that compared to the great benefits that we derive? The State will be repaid two-fold by the information which will be derived from them. I have traversed the Upper Peninsula, and know something of its destined greatness. The population will be numbered by tens of thousands, and their wealth will be counted by millions. Their wealth will, in less than twenty years, at least equal that of the Lower Peninsula. Lumber, fisheries and metals will make it eventually one of the wealthiest portions of the State. Copper, that is found in so few places on the globe, is found there in such abundance that we shall export instead of importing, and be able to supply the world with that metal so necessary to business. Our constitution is destined to last for years to come, and I look to the future as well as the present.

Mr. BRITAIN—I wish to answer one objection. If $4,500 have been paid in from the mines for the privilege of digging copper, will $4,500 pay for the expense of the time of the Legislature, spent in passing charters for that purpose.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE would ask if the charters were of any benefit to the upper country?

Mr. BRITAIN—Well, they prayed for them; they importuned the Legislature so to do; and I shall be willing always that the Legislature shall attend not only to the ordinary claims of its citizens, but any other claim that may grow out of the peculiarity of any county which may demand, perhaps, peculiar measures of relief.

I hope that this answer is satisfactory. The time spent last winter was equal to the entire amount received in the treasury. I apprehend that I have as much care for the new counties as any member upon this floor; and gentlemen will permit me to say that but two propositions meet my approbation: the one from the gentleman from Ionia; the other, that of the gentleman from Oakland.

If you give to every organized county a Representative, such county will claim the right to furnish the candidate, and the inhabitants of any territory afterwards attached will have only the poor privilege of voting for the candidate furnished by the organized county. I have now the map before me. Midland—where is it? What will you do with the counties adjoining it? Do gentlemen propose to attach them hereafter to Midland? They must then vote for the candidate Midland furnishes. Is Midland alone? No sir: we have a string of counties on the north, which should be attached to the counties that have been named, as they can have no Representatives for a long time to come in any other way. I will go beyond the motion of the gentleman from Ionia. I wish to put other counties on an equality with Newaygo. What will you do with Oceana? There is a settlement at White River; how many more I know not; it is a large county—a lumbering county, and a lake county. If you give Newaygo a Representative, where can you put Oceana, lying between Newaygo and the lake? Will you attach her to Ottawa? Ottawa is an old county, and a competing lake county. It would be likely to oppress her. No, sir, you must not give Newaygo a Representative, but you should give Newaygo and such territory as may be attached thereto, one Representative. This would place Oceana, and any other territory hereafter attached to Newaygo, upon an equal footing with Newaygo, as they should be. So much for the care members have for the new counties.

Newaygo has 2000 alone; and Oceana is a new county lying between Newaygo and the lake, and cannot, with the least propriety, be attached to any county except Newaygo, and should be attached to it, and have equal privileges with it until she shall be entitled to a Representative. Montcalm contains about 1500, and should, with such territory as may be hereafter attached, be entitled to one Representative.

The gentlemen will now see that I wish these new territories to be attached together upon some more equitable and reasonable terms than those proposed by the amendments before the Convention. I am not so particular how small or how large these districts are made, but I do not want to disfranchise a large population settled upon territory lying north of these new counties.

I think that none of these amendments should prevail—that the section as reported by the committee is right, and should receive the support of the Convention; and that these additions are not properly in the section, but should be put in the schedule; or some committee should get hold of all the facts in the case, and district this new portion of the State?

An appeal has been made to the members for more light; but the Convention seems still quite in the dark. Should it be so? Can we vote properly with the knowledge now before us? Should it not go to a committee, that they may, after enquiry, report back to the Convention an equitable plan for districting, as I have already said, this new portion of the State.

Mr. ROBERTS—I wish to make a remark about the expense that was said to be incurred by the Legislature for the inhabitants of the upper peninsula, with respect to the charters granted during the last session of the Legislature. I admit the willingness of the gentleman from Berrien to aid the inhabitants of the upper peninsula; but it is a reflection to say that $4,500 was properly spent for that purpose. I ask the gentleman if he, as well as others, was not the cause, by making amendments after the bills were well matured; then, by recommitting to the committee again and again. Then did they not go to the Senate, and by the action of that miserable cobbler who was chairman of the committee on Incorporations of that body, were they not perfectly murdered by a substitute? and each and every charter is refused by the people for whose benefit they were intended to be made, except three, which were smuggled through the Senate by the cobbler Shoemaker, and were passed into laws; and the other thirteen have fallen to the ground.

Mr. BRITAIN—I gave it as my opinion that the money was so expended; and I appeal to the gentleman to say if much of the time occupied by me was not to secure to the inhabitants an ability to tax the property of corporations about to be chartered. The charters already granted imposed a specific State tax, relieving them from all other taxes. I endeavored to get the people relieved from these burdens. Some others suggested that they contained banking privileges.

Mr. ROBERTS—I accord to the gentleman all the merit of his act. He did endeavor to benefit my section by the improvement of the bills; but at the same time, I wish to disabuse this Convention of the idea that this $4,500, paid in from the mining country, has been spent in legislation, or that it was properly so; for it was not the slightest benefit to the country.

Mr. BAGG—There is such a universal blindness here that we can do nothing about it. We had better leave it to the Legislature to do what is right and proper in the case. I am in favor of extending representation to the new counties; but here we cannot go sufficiently into detail for their benefit, which is the reason why I wish it left to the Legislature.

Mr. MASON—I want some more information; and before I vote I shall be glad to hear from the member from Mackinac on this subject. This is a popular subject, and I do not wonder that members talk so feelingly about it. I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Saginaw, but I do not want to give from six to twelve Representatives to the upper peninsula, as we have no evidence that they have any organized government.

Mr. ROBERTS explained that there were organized governments in the upper peninsula, and hoped that the members would leave the affairs of the upper peninsula until the committee could make their report.

Mr. CRARY—I cannot consent. I am sitting here as a representative from the whole State, and I do not wish to exclude any part from the benefits of representation.

Mr. MOORE—We set out with the principle that we would make population a basis for representation for the whole State. If we alter that principle in favor of the new counties, it is merely a measure of courtesy to them, and they should so consider it; although there has been an accusation made that the older counties are not inclined to be just. But as the bill now stands, there is a considerable modification of the principle; as it will require 6,000 in the older counties for a ratio of representation, and if we reduce that ratio in the new counties to 2,000, it is enough.

I am willing to give the new counties now organized a Representative, if they will define what they are—what population they have in each county. If they have but 800 in each county, I shall go the whole length to give the new counties now organized a Representative. I think that there ought to be territory attached to make the number of inhabitants 2,000, and that one Representative should be sent for both. But to give all the new counties hereafter to be organized a Representative, is to be more liberal to them than we have a right to be; it is unjust to the older counties.

I am willing to go as far as we can consistently and properly; but to give thirty or forty new counties a Representative, each, with a population in each of probably not more than four or five hundred, will make half of the House of Representatives of new counties, and would be highly improper and unjust.

A division of the question [Mr. CRARY'S amendment] being had, the motion to strike out prevailed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Edmunds, Gale, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Sutherland, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Webster, White, Whittemore, Willard, Woodman, President—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Axford, Backus, Beeson, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Comstock, Daniels, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Kingsley, Mason, Moore, Newberry, O'Brien, N. Pierce, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Wait, Wells, Williams, Witherell—29.

On motion of Mr. HANSCOM, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Mr. STOREY—I desire to say a single word in reference to some remarks made this morning by the gentleman from Chipewewa, in regard to a constituent of mine, Mr. SHOEMAKER, a Senator in the last Legislature, from Jackson. Had I known anything of the facts, I should have alluded to them the moment the gentleman sat down. I have made some inquiries since the adjournment, and will state what I have learned. Mr. SHOEMAKER was chairman of the committee on incorporations in the Senate, and in that capacity passed upon a large number of mining bills which were brought up by the member from Chipewewa. These bills contained banking as well as other extraordinary powers. They were pruned, reported back to the Senate, and then passed. One important amendment made was to increase the rate of taxation from one-half to one per cent. I make these remarks because I think it is due to Mr. SHOEMAKER, and that the allusions of the gentleman were entirely uncalled for.

Mr. ROBERTS—The gentleman from Jackson says that I have acted uncourtously to Mr. SHOEMAKER, who acted as chairman of the committee on Incorporations. So far from that being the case, it was but a proper and necessary answer to a reflection that was cast upon my section, with regard to the time occupied on the affairs of the upper peninsula for legislative purposes. This Shoemaker passed through his hands three bills from the Senate, at the rate of one-half per cent. upon the capital, real estate and personal property of the companies, which passed through the House of Representatives, of which I had the honor of being a member. Fifteen several bills were sent from the House of the same nature; and with regard to the bills containing banking privileges, the assertion of the gentleman from Jackson is false.

Mr. MASON called the gentleman to order.

The CHAIR was of the opinion that the remarks of the gentleman were not in order.

Mr. McLEOD—If it be in order, I move that the gentleman have leave to proceed. We will take the liberty of replying.

Mr. STOREY—I hope the gentleman may have leave to proceed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTS—I have arrived at this point. Some fifteen bills were about to be sent to the Senate, with a tax of one-half per cent. upon the capital of the company, leaving them still subject to the taxes that might be levied for township and county purposes, a provision which the bills of '48 and '49, did not contain. While they were about to be sent up, three bills came from the Senate which were introduced by this Shoemaker, as chairman of the committee, containing the same provisions as those about to be sent up from the House. The Senate bills came down on Saturday or Monday, and were immediately passed in the House of Representatives, because they were in accordance and keeping with the bills going from the House to the Senate. Shoemaker, after the passage of these three bills, as chairman of the committee, introduced a substitute for the entire fifteen bills, on the Monday morning previous to the adjournment, when it was too late for us to have that interchange of courtesy which we could have had, had it been the middle of the session, or upon ordinary occasions. By his substitute, he made it necessary to pay one per cent. instead of one-half per cent., and made it necessary that the company should not occupy more than 640 acres of land, when the United States' law gives permission to occupy three miles square. He would increase the per cent. upon the House bills, and he would reduce the amount of land. And of that I complain as a wrong, as the three bills had passed from the Senate and through the House, in the manner proposed, in the first instance.

Then these three bills were the property of whom? Of none claiming any interests, or owning any property in the upper peninsula. They were got up for speculation by him, and for speculative purposes; and if it would not occupy the time of this Convention, I could fully satisfy every one of the character and reputation of this man, not only with regard to these bills, but with regard to other matters.

Mr. STOREY—I know, myself, nothing of the facts. I complain of the manner of the attack. It was uncalled for, and ungentlemanly. No sufficient provocation exists, in my opinion, to warrant such an attack upon a gentleman in his absence.

The consideration of the article entitled "Legislative Department" was resumed, and the question being upon inserting the words "at the time of the adoption of this Constitution," proposed by Mr. CRARY this morning.

Mr. McCLELLAND said—I move to strike out the whole, and will then offer a substitute.

The CHAIR—This is an amendment to an amendment; therefore it will not be in order at present.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I will give my reasons why I wish to offer a substitute. I wish to remove the objections which have been raised respecting the new counties having only a paper organization, if I can attain it by the use of the English language, and give to every county that is actually organized a Representative, and permit the Legislature to attach territory, and enable that county to send a Representative when it contains one-half the ratio established by the Legislature. I think this is fair, and I desire it for this reason. If you adopt this proposition, you may prevent the Legislature from organizing new counties when it is necessary.

You should put some number of population in the Constitution which should require the Legislature to organize a county. For if you get up the prejudices of the people against the new counties, as may be done—although I think that the people of the old counties are liberally disposed at present, still a feeling might be got up for the purpose of avoiding any addition to the representation—the people of the new counties might have to wait until they attain a full ratio of representation as established by the Constitution.

Mr. KINGSLEY said—It is proposed by some to give to every county which is now organized, or which may hereafter be organized, one Representative. There is a reason why such a proposition should not succeed, which has not been mentioned. Gentlemen would be surprised to hear that there are one hundred and one counties marked out in this State. Does any one know there is not that number? There is not that number; but there are seventy-three counties in this State which are marked out and counted by law. It is provided that the number of Representatives, during the existence of this constitution, shall not be less than sixty-four nor more than one hundred. Now, it is plain, if we, in the next twenty or twenty-five years, have to supply one Representative to each county that may be organized, it will take seventy-three members to supply the demand, giving one member to each county. If the Legislature make counties hereafter as readily as they have heretofore—sometimes when they have only five or six hundred inhabitants—the Representatives will be drawn away from the old counties. The passage of the land bill now before Congress, or some other circumstance, may give a spur to emigration, and settle the northern counties of the State, so that they may all be organized; and counties having a few hundred inhabitants, within the next twenty years, will be entitled to a Representative—while the county of Wayne, which may have a population of one hundred thousand, will be entitled to one member as the number of Representatives now is; and the same may be said of the other large counties. The injustice of such a state of things is evident.

Mr. K. said he would be as liberal to the new counties as any member. The Convention had been liberal; they had adopted the very provision that had been proposed by a member who desired to favor the new counties. But some members, living in the larger counties, are not satisfied; when the coat is asked for, they say, certainly, take it, and the cloak also.

The substitute proposed by the gentlemen from Ionia [Mr. LOVELL] seemed to be a fair one for the whole State, and the reasons given for the amendment were forcible. But (said Mr. K.) I object to voting for the amendment proposed by him, on the grounds upon which he asks the votes of those living on the line of the central rail road. He says the State has done much for that part of the State—that large sums of money have been expended there for which we are now indebted; and that the new counties are now taxed to pay the interest on money borrowed by the State, laid out in the southern part of it, and from which the more northern counties receive no benefit. The gentleman is mistaken in this position. The State owes nothing for money expended in the construction of the central rail road—or, in other words, the road has been sold for as much as it cost. The State has not only been made whole by the sale of the road, but, by the terms of the contract of sale, the purchasers now pay into the treasury of this State forty-five thousand dollars a year, as a tax upon the road and the property attached thereto. The gentleman has reference to the expenditure of the five million loan. Had no part of that loan been more improvidently laid out than that which was expended in constructing the central rail road, the State would not now be embarrassed by debt. Two millions of dollars of that loan have been lost to the State—sunk—gone—and where has it gone? I could tell the gentleman. I remember the history of the times when the extravagant and foolish expenditures were made. Over seven hundred thousand dollars were thrown away upon the canal at the north, the northern rail road, and other projects equally profitless in the north.

and other parts of this State. No part was thrown away upon the central rail road. No, we are taxed to pay the interest on this lost money, who have received no benefit from its squanderings; but we are willing to be so taxed. It was the misfortune of the times that so much money was expended profitlessly, and we are willing to share in the misfortune. It is frequently claimed that those living on the central rail road are under great obligations to other parts of the State for the construction of that road. Those who think so are in an error. There was a private charter granted for the building of that road, and it was partly built before obtaining the loan. The road would have been constructed without the aid of the State.

Mr. LOVELL—I do not mean to say that all the money has been lost, for the Central rail road brought nearly what it cost; but there was a loss. The five million loan was procured—the money is gone, and we are in debt for it.

Mr. KINGSLEY—As far as the Central rail road is concerned, we have lost but little, as it has paid $45,000 into the treasury. I could tell the gentleman where the two millions have gone. It was done by the joint action of northern and southern votes, that were tied together, vote after vote, vote after vote, as can be seen by reference to the journals; and when we knew that the money must be sunk. I told them that they might as well throw the money in the Detroit River as lay it out on the Southern rail road. But the north must not say that they have to pay for what they did not vote.

Mr. BACKUS—I have listened to this discussion with much interest, for it involves considerations of the gravest importance, as moulding the representation of the State, and which will guide, control, govern and manage our policy hereafter. It is important in every point of view; and every member, I trust, feels this importance, or otherwise it would not have elicited so much discussion; and we should well consider the measures to be adopted, as we shall thus fix the future policy of the State. I have listened to the claim set forth as to the rights and claims of the new counties of the State to representation; and I would urge upon the consideration of this Convention, that we should not only be just but generous. The provision of the bill, as it originally stood, was generous; it was more than generous.

I assume, for the purpose of discussion, that the ratio of representation, as provided by the section under consideration, will be eight thousand. If so, the present proposition proposes to give the new counties the diminished ratio of two thousand, which is tantamount to giving the new counties four Representatives, to one in the old counties. I submit this is extra liberal. What do they seek to have represented here? Do they seek that the rocks and trees and rivers should be represented here, as stated by the gentleman from Calhoun? Call it then by its right name. Call it a representation of rocks, or of trees or of rivers. Let every 80 acres of land poll its vote in the State, by proxy; for by the term representation, you must have some standard by which to be guided; property or persons.

The policy at present is that population should form the basis of representation—individuals—people—not territory. For the argument's sake, I accord the principle; and what will be the effect? If there is in a county fifteen inhabitants, those fifteen have the same power and control over local and general matters in your Legislature, that 7000 or 8000 people have, located in the more densely peopled portion of the State. Is this right?

One of the first maxims that I learned—and I have seen no reason to depart from the rule—was that "justice is equality." Do gentlemen seek more than equality, or do they want a population of ten or one hundred, purporting to be organized, to claim at the hands of your Legislature the reception of a Representative?

They tell of vast improvements that will be made by the Representatives bringing to us favorable reports of their counties—that they will further stimulate the increase of population by holding out the fact that they are represented. Should that be the policy, Mr. Chairman—should you deprive the people of their representation in the councils of the State because, forsooth, there happens to be a district of country without people, that you want, for its improvement, to be represented, without regard to the number of people that inhabit it?

Sir, it contains all the odious features that were incident to the English rotten borough system, and that was unjust, unholy and unrighteous in its principle, where one, five or ten men could send a man into the Parliament of Great Britain to exercise the same influence there that another did who was sent by 10,000; and yet this system is asked of us by the proposition now under consideration. With them I have the highest sympathies. But they ought to be fair; they ought to concede something like equality. Are they equal in population? They don't pretend that they are. Are they equal in property? Look at your tax-rolls, and you will be convinced to the contrary. Is representation to follow property or persons? If property is to be represented, let it be so, and call it so. If property, then 80 acres of the non-resident lands have a right to a vote. If people, should they not be content with a four-fold representation. If they have the ratio for representation, they are entitled to it; but we offer them three or four to one. We can only learn one fact—that they are new counties; but can any argument be drawn from that fact? If there is a county that has 500 inhabitants, I should like to hear any argument, either logical or based upon common sense, that would prove, because they happen to live in a particular district of the country that is new, they are entitled to a Representative, while in another portion of the same community, unless they have 7000, they cannot be heard.

Strong objections have been made to the propriety of attaching territory to the new counties. Where is the hardship? It is alleged that whatever the more populous county to which country is attached desires, it will prevail, and leave the attached district overwhelmed by a majority. This is the law of majorities, and the fact is simply this, sir, that the majority of voters are in that part of the district. The moment that, in the territory attached, the population preponderates over the county to which it is attached, it can send to this Hall the person they choose; until then the majority prevails elsewhere. And so it should be. What brings us here? It is, sir, because we hold in our hands the evidence that we were sent by a majority of the people in our respective counties; so the same rule is applied to us as to them. But it is urged that representation will increase the population in the new counties. Will a Representative develop the resources of the county by building mills, or by agricultural pursuits? How will it be done more than by any other man? But, it is said he will give us information. So will every adventurer who goes there; and population will only be induced to go when they are satisfied that they will obtain the greatest reward for their labor.

I will go as far as I consistently can; I will be what I deem liberal; but I cannot vote without further information, as there is not evidence before this Convention that in one of these new counties thus proposed to be represented, there is a population of three hundred. If this Convention say that every organized county shall have a Representative when it has a population of 300, we shall know what it means; and it is a proposition that I don't say I shall not go for; but to leave it uncertain, indefinite, when the population may vary from 50 to 5000, is what I must object to. If there is any reason for admitting the counties that are now organized, the same reasons will apply in favor of the counties hereafter to be organized; and yet, by the amendment, a county that is unorganized to day, might increase her population to a quota to morrow, and yet would be excluded until the year 1859. But there is no reason, no propriety, that an independent district of country should send a Representative without reference to its population. That sanctions the principle that the district shall be represented, not the people; and at the same time the constituency might not exceed fifteen in number.

Would it not be fair to prohibit the Legislature from admitting a Representative until there is a reasonable number of people? Cannot the Convention itself fix the number? If the population increases so rapidly, they will soon reach it, and be entitled to a Representative. But suppose the counties cannot be admitted, what injury do they suffer? Are they not represented in common with the country to which they are attached?

I have yet to learn that the interests of one portion of the State are diverse from that of another, or that we meet here for ought but the common welfare. Are our Representatives, that in future we elect, to be bound by the narrow prejudices of representing towns? If so, by carrying out the principle, if we give a county one Representative, but a small portion will actually be represented.

The gentleman [Mr. CHURCH] says that one person cannot represent Newaygo and Kent—that their interests are diverse. He should have found out their interests, or he has no business here purporting to represent them. But I know that he has liberality of mind enough to embrace Newaygo as well as the county of Kent in the discharge of his duties. The effect will be that we must increase the ratio, or increase the number of the House of Representatives, by assuming this extra liberality to the new counties. They say they may be misrepresented; but they suffer no wrong. We sometimes think that we are misrepresented by our legislators; but we bow submissively to the will of the majority.

The provision made by the committee of the whole, making 2,000 the number of the population requisite in the new counties, while in the older it requires a ratio of 3,000 for one Representative, I say is liberal enough; and to seek for more is unjust in theory and fact, and would contain a provision perfectly unsound.

In Connecticut, all towns organized after a certain date have but one Representative, while the older towns have two—the reverse of the present proposition. But we have no right to barter away a trust by giving representation to woods, trees and wolves, when you have men who pay your taxes. If the State is assailed, who will defend it? Not the unpeopled counties; but you must come where the people are who, in addition, pay all the taxes that support your State. If the lands should be represented, the voters are in New York, partly, and scattered abroad, perhaps, in every State in the Union. But do not have the rotten borough system when the principle should be that men only should represent men.

Mr. MASON—By the act of the Legislature, the five counties of the upper peninsula have all the privileges of organized counties. Then the moment this proposition is carried, they will be entitled to a Representative—and yet, in the whole five counties they only cast 227 votes.

Mr. HANSCOM—I wish to make a statement respecting the population of the five counties:

Houghton has	1,800 to 2,200
Ontonagen	900 to 1,100
Schoolcraft	400 to 500
Marquette	800 to 900

With respect to the 227 votes being cast, I would remark that the population is very much scattered, so that it is impossible to obtain a full turn out of the voters. A proportion of the population, too, are foreigners, who are engaged in mining, who may become voters, and, at any rate, should have some legal rights. I think that the statement I have made that there are 3,500 to 4,000, is not far from the fact.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—Houghton is the only organized county in the upper peninsula, except Chippewa.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I want full information—no attempt at smuggling, as we have, or are supposed to have, a treasury here.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—It is said that the other counties have the privileges of organized counties, but they are attached for representative purposes to Chippewa.

Mr. WOODMAN—When the subject was first brought up, I felt myself bound to act liberally—give each new county one Representative. I still think the same, and I must say that I prefer the proposition of the member from Monroe.

Mr. MASON—I would inquire of the gentleman from Oakland if he is correct about the number being 3,000 or 4,000? I think he cannot have good grounds of information; it cannot be possible that there is that number in the northern peninsula, when they only show a return of 227 voters.

Mr. HANSCOM—They vote all one way there, so there is no use making any particular effort.

Mr. MASON—They come here with two certificates—

Mr. CRARY called the gentleman to order.

The CHAIR—The gentlemen from St. Clair is out of order, calling in question the right of a member to his seat in this House.

Mr. MASON—I have done no such thing. I trust that I may give a state-of facts that exist in the State departments, without being called to order. I have said nothing about their rights, nor do I desire to do so. I repeat that I do not think it probable that there can be a population of 4,000, when they poll but 227 votes. The gentleman from Chippewa refuses to give us light, will tell us no facts, while we are compelled to give our votes upon the question without being able to ascertain whether these four counties will send four members, and only poll 227 votes, when they should have a population of 10,000 to entitle them to it. I hope, as the gentleman has suggested, we shall leave the upper peninsula alone until we have the report of the committee.

The question being upon inserting the words "at the time of the adoption of this constitution," proposed by Mr. CRARY, the yeas and nays were demanded, and the amendment was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, Beardsley, Bush, Chapel, Church, Danforth, Hanscom, Lovell, Orr, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Walker, Webster—14.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagge, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Choate, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kinne, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Wells, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—74.

Mr. LOVELL moved to strike out the balance of the amendment made in committee, and insert the following:

"Provided, That each county having an organized county government, and the territory attached thereto, shall be entitled to one Representative; and that each county hereafter organized, and the territory attached thereto, if any, shall be entitled to a separate Representative when it shall have attained a population equal to a moiety of the ratio of representation heretofore established."

Mr. SKINNER would inquire how many Representatives would be given to the upper peninsula? I wish the gentleman to explain.

Mr. LOVELL—I should prefer referring him to the gentleman who represents the upper country. The want of knowledge in that quarter is the only thing that has given me the least uneasiness. I will inform the gentleman, as far as I can, respecting the lower peninsula. It will give a member to Sanilac, which has a population of from two to three thousand, one to Montcalm, with a population of nearly two thousand; Midland, the amount of population I do not know; Newaygo is not an organized county. I am not certain, but I believe that, by the amendment, Mackinac and Chippewa would lose their Representative.

Mr. ROBERTS—As the Representative from Chippewa, he begged leave to say that he hoped the Convention would except the upper peninsula until the committee made their report.

Mr. CORNELL—I see the member from Chippewa is in his seat. We wish him to give the information that we so much need. I feel bound to call for it, so that this Convention can take action.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the amendment of the committee of the whole by inserting after "county," the words "with such territory as may be attached thereto;" which was decided not in order.

A division of the question was had, and the motion to strike out prevailed, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagge, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Graham, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Newberry, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Wells, Whittemore, Williams, Witherell, Woodman, President—54.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Barnard, Burns, Bush, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Dimond, Eastman, Edmunds, Gale, Hanscom, Hart, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, McLeod, Morrison, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Prevost, Roberts, Rix Robinson, Soule, Sturgis, Sutherland, Walker, Webster, White, Willard—37.

The amendment was then adopted, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—78.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Backus, Bagg, Butterfield, S. Clark, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Hart, Moore, Storey, Wells, White—13.

And the amendment as amended was then concurred in.

The third amendment to the article was concurred in. The fourth amendment being under consideration,

Mr. HANSCOM moved to strike out "thirty-two," and insert "twenty-two."

A division of the question was called, and the motion to strike out lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Axford, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beeson, Butterfield, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Hanscom, Hart, McLeod, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Roberts, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Sturgis, Warden, Webster, President—24.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Backus, Bagg, Beardsley, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, O'Brien, Prevost, Redfield, Skinner, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Walker, Wells, White, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman—57.

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend the amendment by striking out the last clause, being all after the word "inclusive," in the second line.

Pending which, on motion of Mr. GARDINER, the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, (30th day,) July 15.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. TOOKER.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the journal of Saturday, by striking out the following:

"Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the amendment of the committee of the whole, by inserting after 'county,' the words 'with such territory as may be attached thereto.'"

"Which was decided not in order."

Mr. BRITAIN wished to have a vote of the Convention upon the motion. It was due to the Secretary to say that it was inserted at his [Mr. B's] request. He [Mr. B.] believed every measure originated by a member should go on the journal. He saw no reason why the journal should not be a true record of the proceedings. There could be no reason why one-half should be struck out.

Mr. HANSCOM said there was much force in the observation of the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.] Two other propositions were offered and not placed on the journals. If the proposition of the gentleman from Berrien should remain on the journal, he should press for the insertion of those propositions.

The CHAIR said, only matter which had been acted upon by the Convention ought to be entered upon the journal, under the parliamentary rule. To bring matter on the journal which had been ruled out of order might create great difficulty.

The journal was so corrected.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. BACKUS: of H. Eisnack and 20 others, naturalized citizens, praying that the elective franchise may not be extended to foreigners, until they shall have been regularly naturalized as required by existing laws.

Laid upon the table.

By Mr. WHITE: of C. A. Shaw and 103 others, citizens of Lapeer, Oakland and Macomb counties, in relation to equalization and collection of taxation.

REPORTS.

Mr. BUSH, from the committee on township officers and township government, submitted

ARTICLE —.

Township Officers and Government.

1. The duties of each organized township shall be performed by one supervisor, one township clerk, one school inspector, not exceeding four justices of the peace, and not exceeding four constables. The Legislature shall provide for their election and define their respective duties.

The article was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered printed.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HANSCOM offered a resolution that after this day the daily morning sessions of this Convention shall commence at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. H. believed that gentlemen could make arrangements to meet at that time. The morning was the best part of the day to labor. He believed the Convention would be able to do more business between half-past seven and half-past eight, than in two hours in the middle of the day. He hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. WHITE moved to insert "six o'clock."

Mr. WITHERELL saw no reason why the resolution should not be adopted, if members could attend at that time; as the gentleman from Oakland had observed, it would be pleasanter to meet at an early hour. It would be in accordance with our business at home, and he [Mr. W.] was disposed to attend to the public business at the same time. It would add one hour daily for public business, and hasten the proceedings of the Convention.

Mr. J. BARTOW—If the gentleman from Wayne would commence early in a morning and continue all day, he would only come up to the modicum of his portion of labor; I think the gentleman should come earlier and stop later than the rest to make up for lost time; and if we were like the gentleman from Oakland, could work all day and sit up all night, we might adopt it; but as we have not that capability, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was lost.

Mr. WHITE thought there was an evident impropriety in requiring members to meet at that hour. It was well known that several of the delegates boarded at a distance from the capitol. It was more than they could do to arrive here at the time proposed.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE was in favor of the motion, but it did not go far enough. It would be better to do our business in the dark. Darkness was best. It would be better to meet at four o'clock. He moved to strike out "half-past seven," and insert "four."

Mr. BAGG—I hope the amendment will not prevail. The gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. PIERCE] says he wants to do business in the dark. I am opposed to every thing of that kind. A gentleman said the other day, when speaking on single districts, he would split up the people. Split them up? I object to my constituents being split up in the dark, anyhow.

The amendments were negatived, and the resolution adopted.

Mr. CHAPPEL offered a resolution that the afternoon sessions of the Convention commence hereafter at two o'clock.

Mr. GALE moved to amend by inserting "one."

Mr. ALVORD moved to insert "half-past twelve."

On motion of Mr. AXFORD, the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. STOREY moved to amend rule 8 by striking out "one hour," and inserting "five minutes;" so that it would read: "no member shall speak more than twice on the same question, nor more than five minutes at any one time, without the consent of the Convention."

Mr. W. ADAMS moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was carried.

Mr. AXFORD offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, This Convention did adjourn on the 29th day of June last past, until the 9th day of July instant, therefore, in the opinion of this Convention, it would be unjust to the tax payers of this State for the members or officers of this Convention to receive any pay from the public treasury of this State during said adjournment; therefore,

Resolved, That for and during said adjournment, no member or officer of this Convention is justly entitled to or should receive any pay during said adjournment, and that no money shall be drawn from the public treasury of this State for that purpose.

Mr. AXFORD called for the yeas and nays, and demanded the previous question.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. CLARK rose to a question of order—whether the last motion could be entertained after the previous question was demanded.

The CHAIR said, had the gentleman asked for the yeas and nays, and there stopped, the CHAIR would have sustained it; but he called for both.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

Resolved, That the time members of this body have spent unnecessarily out of the Convention during its sessions, shall be deducted in the estimate for their per diem allowance.

Mr. AXFORD withdrew the preamble and resolution.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH renewed them with the addition of his resolution.

On motion of Mr. AXFORD, the preamble and resolutions were indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WOODMAN offered the following:

Whereas, It has been formally announced to this Convention, that General ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, departed this life on the evening of the 9th inst;

And whereas, Not only the distinguished position, but the virtues of the man whose death has been thus announced, challenge from us and the whole American people, deep sorrow for the National bereavement; therefore,

Resolved, That as a "testimonial of the deep and profound respect for the memory of the deceased," and in accordance with a long established usage, that a committee of be appointed by the President of this Convention to procure some suitable member of this body to pronounce an eulogy on the "life and public services of General ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States."

Resolved, That said committee be and hereby are instructed to make the suitable arrangements as to time and place, and report to this Convention in due time.

The blank was filled with "nine;" and the preamble and resolutions adopted.

The unfinished business of yesterday was taken up. The matter under consideration, being the amendments made in committee of the whole to "Article —, Legislative Department;" and the question being on a motion to strike out the last clause of the amendment to section five: "No county shall be divided in the formation of Senate districts, except such county shall be equitably entitled to two or more Senators."

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "districts."

Mr. C. thought it should stand as proposed to be amended; he saw no necessity for making a distinction between old and new counties.

Mr. COOK—If the amendment prevail, the Senators would be elected by general ticket, in large counties. Wayne would have three members combined in a district. If we have single districts at all, the principle should be carried out. It would certainly give more power to large counties than the new. They would naturally have larger power on account of their numbers.

Mr. BAGG would like to know how a single Senatorial district would be affected by the county of Wayne being divided or split up; what difference would it make to any other county, how the Senators in Wayne county were elected? It can only affect the district in which they are elected. The laws passed by the Legislature must be of a general character. Local legislation is about being given to the boards of supervisors. He hoped gentlemen would not get up those prejudices between big and little counties. It could not have any different effect in any new county, whether Senators in the large counties are elected by general ticket or in single districts.

Mr. FRALICK believed, if the motion prevailed, the effect would be a little different from what the gentleman expects. The State shall be divided into thirty-two districts; you can but elect one in a district. If you cannot divide a county, they can have but one Senator. That appeared to him to be very unjust.

Mr. WALKER—If the motion of the gentleman from Kent [Mr. CHURCH] should prevail, the Senators in any county, which by its population would be entitled to more than one Senator, would be elected by general ticket. It would give to a county entitled to a single Senator, the right to elect without combination with any other county. In counties where they elect more than one, it would allow the people to elect them as Senators of the county. They would be Senators of counties, except where the population of counties do not entitle them to a Senator, and they are grouped together.

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the ayes and noes.

Mr. MASON supposed that the Convention understood that, as the amendment stands, if it should be adopted, it would leave the large counties with but one Senator.

The motion to amend, made by Mr. CHURCH, was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arzeno, H. Bartow, Church, Danforth, Hart, Hathaway, Rix Robinson, Sturgis—8.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asabel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, President—77.

The question recurring on Mr. MORRISON's proposition,

Mr. MASON was opposed to striking out; he saw no necessity for it. It was made under an impression that the larger counties would not be entitled to an equitable share. If the same construction be put upon the clause as under the old constitution, where there should be a moiety, they should be entitled to another member. There is no necessity for the amendment. There would be a difficulty in cutting up county lines. The part cut off will be alienated and estranged from the county. Innumerable difficulties will arise in their county politics, especially in their Senatorial politics.

I cannot think (said Mr. M.) that any gentleman from a large county will consent to have a part of its population cut off and associated with another county.

Mr. WELLS moved to strike out of the third line, the word "equitably."

Mr. COOK said the gentleman would find the word in one or more constitutions. It was intended to cover the moiety principle where they will not be fully entitled to a member.

The amendment offered to the amendment of the committee of the whole was lost. The amendment reported by the committee of the whole was concurred in.

Sec. 7. Substitute reported by the committee of the whole was read:

"No person holding any office under the United States or this State, or any county office, (notaries public, officers of the militia and officers elected by townships excepted,) shall be eligible to, or have a seat in, either house of the Legislature; and all votes given for any such person shall be void."

Mr. MORRISON moved to amend by inserting after the words "county office," the words "or the office of supervisor of a township."

Mr. M. said he offered the amendment for the reason that it is proposed to make the supervisors of a county, to a greater or less extent, a legislative body. Their duties in a county may conflict with the duties of a legislator. They may both be in session at the same time.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. CHURCH moved to amend the section by inserting after the word "militia," the words "post masters."

Mr. COOK—Is the object of the gentleman to exclude post masters?

Mr. CHURCH—My object is not to exclude post masters from the Legislature. I cannot say, shut them out. I do not think there is any equity in it. There are a few large post offices. Those holding them would hardly be likely to be candidates for the Legislature; but post masters, where the duties are small, should not be excluded from the Legislature, such as the gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. J. CLARK.] I should like to know if there be any reasons, based on the discharge of their duties to the United States, that should exclude them. The holding of many of the post offices is an actual favor to the inhabitants; the emoluments of the office not paying for the trouble. That is the case through half the State. To exclude those post masters merely because they are post masters, on the mere cry, "shut them out," I think not right.

Mr. J. BARTOW said—I take great pleasure in supporting the motion. I am surprised to hear that a gentleman of the experience of the gentleman from Calhoun, should say, "shut them out." How will the duties of post masters interfere with legislative duties? What obligation will they enter into to the State that will interfere with their duties as post masters? They do not conflict in any shape. If they neglect their duties by coming to the Legislature, the general government alone can take cognizance of it.

It is true, (said Mr. B,) to my certain knowledge, that in a large portion of my section of country, as stated by the gentleman from Kent, the post masters hold not for the emoluments, but for the accommodation of the inhabitants; and they are the very persons we should like to see as members of the Legislature. Every post master is required to have a deputy. To say they shall be taken from the hands of the public and disfranchised, would be unjust in the highest degree. We should do an injury both ways; it would deprive them of their natural rights, and deprive the people of the valuable services of able men.

Mr. CRARY said he should not have risen if he had not been called upon for his reasons for excluding post masters. For the six years ending in 1841, more than 300 post masters were appointed in Michigan, and in very few instances were there less than two candidates for each office. He did not recollect of a single instance of refusal to accept the office. He would disconnect the office of Representative from every United States' office, for the purpose of keeping the attention of the Representative, as much as possible, confined to the particular business of a State government. This could not be done if the officers of the United States were allowed to enter the halls of a State Legislature, and interfere with domestic legislation. Many of these offices were highly lucrative, and the incumbents would generally look to the power whence they derived their chief emoluments. The office of post master was often more lucrative than any county office. If the county officer is to be excluded, then the post master should be also.

If the duties of a county officer are incompatible with a seat in the Legislature, so are the duties of the office of post master. Post masters have franking privileges, are appointed for political purposes, and by their position can exert more influence than any county officer. There are men enough without them, who can serve the State in all matters of legislation. Many of the post masters receive large salaries.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked who of the post masters receive more than $200 annually.

Mr. CRARY—Many, but I cannot enumerate them all.

Mr. WILLIAMS—There are not more than 20 in the State.

Mr. CRARY—If only 15, they ought to be excluded. Why exclude deputy marshals, revenue officers, and light house keepers, and retain post masters? All should be excluded. No United States' officer should be allowed a seat in the Legislature. Cut off post masters, and all are excluded.

Mr. HANSCOM believed there was as much necessity for the exclusion of post masters as for the exclusion of any county officer; in fact, there was more absolute reason for their exclusion, however great or small their emoluments. Contests may arise between the State and the general government, especially respecting the rights of sovereignty. It is familiar to all that the cohort of post-masters owe a sort of allegiance to the United States government for the time being. Evils have arisen in other States, and persons attached to the general government should not be placed in any situation to affect the interests or rights of the State in such cases.

One argument why they should not be excluded is, that they are a respectable and valuable class. But are not our county officers as respectable as post-masters? They say they hold this office for the accommodation of the people. Sir, there are not ten post offices in the State but there are quarrels to get them—contentions for them.

Let them take this office on condition that they exclude themselves from the Legislature of the State. The case is isolated where there are not a dozen or fifty men capable of holding the office of legislator. There are cases where they get four times as much compensation as they can receive for services as legislators. I believe (said Mr. H.) in disconnecting the legislation of the State from any office under the general government.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH regretted to dissent from his colleague, for whose opinions he entertained much respect; but he believed it would be invidious to exclude post-masters from the halls of legislation. It is known that a large majority of these officers in our peninsula get but a small pittance for their services. How the duties of a post master can conflict with his duties as a member of the Legislature, he [Mr. VAN V.] could not conceive. It must be admitted that in some districts it is difficult to get persons to take the office, the emoluments being so small. Those persons should not be excluded; they are the very best persons to represent the people.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I had a commission sent me, and declined it. If I had accepted it, I should not have been less competent to perform my duties in this Convention. I do not think there are more than a dozen or fifteen post-masters in the State who receive for their services two hundred dollars a year. He did not pretend to entire accuracy, however. He had sent for a book containing the list.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—There are some considerations why the amendment should be adopted, if the new counties should be entitled to Representatives. It is well understood by those acquainted with the localities, that there are individuals in those localities who would take the office for the convenience of the inhabitants—who would take it on no other consideration. Those, perhaps, are the very men whom the people of the county would choose to send to the Legislature. I do not (said Mr. B.) see the force of the argument of the gentleman from Oakland.

Mr. HANSCOM—Have they not advantages over other classes? Have they not more privileges?

Mr. BUTTERFIELD—I think not. It may be the case in large towns, but not in small ones. For electioneering purposes, there are some that possess more facilities than post-masters. If one exception should be made, I hope it will be made in favor of my friend from St. Clair, [Mr. J. CLARK.] He is the only remaining monument of the sagacity of Jackson's administration.

He has survived the wreck of matter of the political world. His services in the Convention that framed the Constitution, and in the Senate, have been almost invaluable to the State. Shall he be excluded? He is one of our most valuable members. From the simple fact that he holds a remote post office, shall the State be deprived of his services? So long as he remains, I hope he will remain post master; and at the same time the State may demand his services here or elsewhere.

Mr. S. CLARK called for the previous question, which was sustained; and the amendment offered by Mr. CHURCH was negatived:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Barnard, J. Bartow, Beardsley, Asahel Brown, Bush, Butterfield, Chandler, Church, S. Clark, Comstock, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Desnoyers, Dimond, Edmunds, Gale, Green, Hart, Hascall, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Newberry, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Wells, Whipple, Williams, Woodman—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Carr, Chapel, Choate, Conner, Crary, Danforth, Daniels, Eastman, Eaton, Fralick, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Harvey, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Marvin, Mason, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Robertson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Walker, Warden, Webster, White, Whittemore, Willard, Witherell, President—51.

The substitute proposed by the committee of the whole for section 7 was then concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS would take the opportunity to explain. He held in his hand a book published by the P. O. Department. In 1847, there were twenty-eight post masters who received over $200.

The amendments made in committee of the whole to section eleven were concurred in.

Mr. BRITAIN moved a reconsideration of the vote. He thought it too much to require one-fifth of the members elected to sustain the call for the yeas and nays, when a bare quorum might be present.

Mr. COOK explained. Each House may adopt by rule what number they please; being a less number than one-fifth. This would be a constitutional privilege.

The motion to reconsider did not prevail.

Section 17 was read.

Mr. J. BARTOW moved to strike out the last clause: "The Legislature shall not, at the expense of the State, provide for its members books, newspapers, or other perquisites of office not expressly authorized by this Constitution."

Mr. B. said, the same section has already limited the expenses of that kind to the sum of five dollars, during any one session. It seems the clause is entirely superfluous, the whole subject being embraced in the foregoing provision.

Mr. BRITAIN—The gentleman will see that the previous clause does not prevent the Legislature appropriating themselves books. It has been common for members to furnish themselves with law libraries, at great expense to the State, and disadvantages to the people.

Mr. BARTOW would say, if such an evil exists, it is not for want of this clause.

The law does not authorize the appropriation of such a superfluous number of the session laws as would justify the assertion of the gentleman from Berrien. It is enough for me to say (said Mr. B.) that such a number of the laws are published as will supply each member with copies from year to year. If it only goes to this, I see no force in it. If it was to prevent taking session laws, it might be proper; but it might be remedied by publishing a less number.

It is not a proper clause in the Constitution. A contingency may arise, in which it may be proper to have more furnished. To assume that we shall have to furnish the Legislature with the periodicals and romances of the day would be a reflection on the dignity of the State; but it would not be objectionable to furnish this Convention with the constitutions of other States. I have no fear of the Legislature. As for the other term in the clause, "perquisites of office," there is another term for it—"stealings in,"—which is understood to be synonymous. I wish to keep anything about "stealings in" out of the constitution.

Mr. BRITAIN—I do not wish to say what the "stealings in" may mean; but I wish to cut it off. I would allow members a copy of their own session laws. I wish to cut them off from spending their time about those "stealings in," which amounts to more than what they obtain.

The question was taken on striking out and lost:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, J. Bartow, Butterfield, Carr, Hanscom, Roberts, Storey, Sutherland, Van Valkenburg, Whipple—10.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Chandler, Chapel, Church, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Dimond, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McCelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Walker, Webster, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—67.

The amendments made in committee of the whole were then concurred in.

Sec. 19. The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives (shall receive no additional compensation in virtue of their offices.)

Mr. McCLELLAND said, if this amendment prevailed, it would be necessary to fix the compensation for the President of the Senate. He would move to amend so that it shall read:

"The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House shall receive the same per diem and mileage as members of the Legislature, and no more."

Which was adopted, and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

Amendments to sections 20 and 23 were concurred in.

Section 25, providing that the printing ordered by the Legislature shall be let by contract to the lowest bidder, and specifying the manner of printing, was read.

Mr. GARDINER moved to strike from the section sub-divisions 2 and 3, viz:

2. Bills and resolutions shall be done in the usual manner, and the price of composition shall be one-third that of solid matter.

3. Blank pages or fractions of pages shall not be computed in the estimate of composition, and no charge except for reading matter actually set shall be allowed.

Mr. G. said—My reasons for moving to strike out these sub-divisions, are plain and easily expressed. The first sub-division I move to strike out for the reason that it is perfectly useless where it is. The next Legislature may be unable to carry it out or estimate what is one-third solid matter. The usual method, if the Legislature want it leaded, is to compute it as solid matter. The clause is an invasion upon a practice of printers, which has existed so long that it has passed into a law among the craft.

With respect to the third sub-division, the Legislature, in order to carry that out, will be obliged to have a committee of printers during the whole of the session. It excludes blank lines, and every thing of that kind, from counting in composition. It is going to operate to the injury of the craft through the whole of the State, if you put it in the Constitution. It will become the butt of attack for all the presses of the United States—for the press to aim their shafts at—and you will get rebuffs from all the presses. They will attack it—they will tell you it is a failure. You cannot carry it into effect.

For my part, I should like to see the whole amendments stricken out. They are futile and useless, and expose the Convention to the ridicule of the press. They cannot be carried out unless a committee of printers be in attendance during the session.

Mr. HASCALL—I have listened with some attention to the remarks of my brother of the press from Washtenaw, [Mr. GARDINER,] and find myself obliged to disagree with him. He objects that under the second clause it will be impracticable to fix the price of bills and resolutions. I can see no difficulty. Let the price be computed in the usual manner, and divide that by three, and you have the price as contemplated by the clause objected to. The process is perfectly practicable and perfectly simple.

But the third clause is also objected to, and is sought to be stricken out. If this be done, all the rest may as well follow; for this clause is the very heart of the whole matter. The improper practices which have prevailed in the State in regard to the public printing, have nearly all originated from the want of a provision similar to the one contained in this clause. The gentleman says it is altering the rule which has always prevailed among printers. This is true; but in legislative printing, such as we see in our daily journals, many times more blank space occurs than in any other kind of printing. Take an example; we sometimes have a copy of the journal laid upon our table with one printed page and three blank pages. Now, by a rule of printers, these three blank pages are all counted and charged as reading matter, actually printed.

The principle may be illustrated in this way: A farmer has an eighty acre lot; in one corner of that lot he has standing ten acres of wheat; he hires a man to cut it; and when the man brings in his bill, he (the farmer) is surprised to find that he is charged for cutting eighty acres of wheat. When inquired of as to the principle on which such a charge is founded, the laborer answers: "Why, sir, I have had to walk across your large lot to get at my labor, and I think I ought to be paid for it. You, yourself, are to blame for not having the whole field covered with wheat."

This, sir, I believe, is a fair illustration. Now, had the whole field been covered with wheat, except here and there a vacant patch, of small account, he would be right in charging for the whole area of the field, and his charge would not have been disputed. This is the full extent of the meaning of the rule among printers. But it has been said that masons and joiners, and other mechanics make these constructive charges; and in plastering and siding a building, the space occupied by the doors and windows are charged for. This is right. But I ask, sir, suppose, upon a wall a hundred yards square, ten yards should have been knocked off, and you should employ a mason to patch it up, and he should bring in a charge for the whole hundred yards, would this be submitted to? I think not.

Sir, our public documents go into the archives of other States. The manner in which they have been printed heretofore, has done great discredit to our State. I wish to compel State printers hereafter to perform their labors in a workmanlike manner, and then to pay them a fair and compensating price. The people will never object to pay a just price for any necessary labor performed for them. As to the objection, that these restrictions will have an injurious tendency upon printers throughout the State, I think differently. When printers at the capital are compelled to do the State work in a proper and workmanlike manner, and receive therefor healthy and fair prices, this will have its influence throughout the State, and country printers will not be compelled to do work at the miserable pittance which has been bid by State printers, for two or three years past; and who, in order to live by their contracts, have been compelled to gouge the State in every possible manner. I think, sir, the craft will soon realize the benefits of this stable and healthy manner of conducting the public printing. I hope the good sense of the Convention will see the impropriety of striking out.

Mr. MOORE had supposed the printers had fixed it all up. The man taking the contract would understand it. He saw no reason why it should be struck out.

Mr. GARDINER—I was well aware I should meet with opposition from my friend from Kalamazoo, on this subject. But I think I am right in the proposition as far as these fractional pages are concerned; and those blank lines. If I were State printer I would make it up and print it in a solid form; and the Legislature would not thank the printer for setting it up in such a shape. How would it look? But as to blank pages, this mode of estimating the work of mechanics is not confined to printers alone. Go to your mechanics—a carpenter for instance. Does he charge by the piece only, for the siding he puts upon your house? Does he not charge in his measurement for the space occupied by the doors and windows? A plasterer who does his work by the piece—does he take out all the doors and windows when he estimates his charge? By no means, sir. There is a difference between mechanical work and farming work; and a great deal of difference between farming and printing; between agricultural work and mechanical work. It runs through the whole routine of business. This is an innovation on the rule of the mechanical craft, not only in this State, but through all the States.

The gentleman from Kalamazoo says he had an interview with the State printer. I have seen him, and he talked different to me. But, of what use is that? he will probably never take it again. He says he is losing money every day. I ask that you will not make this innovation—not make us a laughing stock to the the press.

Mr. N. PIERCE said, he could see no harm in the provisions of the section. It is only a description of the work; it can make no difference to the printer. It is not expected the printer will work for nothing. I would say (said Mr. P.) that ancient rules have been done away with. The ancient jury system has almost been done away with. He saw no necessity for striking this out; it describes the work, so that the account shall be rendered in a particular way. It does not affect the pay of the printer.

The question was taken on striking out sub-divisions two and three, and lost. The amendment made in committee of the whole was concurred in.

The amendments to sections 26 and 27 were likewise concurred in.

Section 28 was read.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to strike out "chaplain or," so that the section should read: "They shall have no power to pay for any religious services in either House."

Mr. C. said he did not wish the amendment of the committee to be concurred in; but if it should, it might exclude a chaplain from the Penitentiary, which he supposed was not the intention of the Convention.

Mr. MASON hoped the amendment would not prevail; and that the members of the Convention were not prepared to concur in the amendment made in committee. We should be the first State to make a thrust at the christian religion. The object of the amendment was to strike out a part of the section, and he supposed it might be proper; but he hoped the whole amendment of the committee would be struck out. He saw no reason why the chaplain should be in our Penitentiary and not in the Legislature. He thought they required a chaplain more in the Legislature than in the State prison.

If the principle is to be adopted, it should be made universally applicable—in the State prison, the army, in Congress, and the several State Legislatures. The principle has obtained ever since the formation of our government, to recognize the principles of religion by having the sessions of Congress and of every State Legislature opened with prayer, and he hoped Michigan would not take the first step in doing away with this time honored practice.

Mr. WOODMAN—Unless some one springs the previous question, this matter will undergo a long investigation. Many gentlemen will speak on the subject. I want to explain my views. As the hour of adjournment has arrived, I move the Convention adjourn.

The motion was lost.

Mr. MOORE—I do not think it necessary to take up time in discussing this question. I believe members have their minds made up on the subject. I shall go for restoring the original section. I do not think it is necessary for the friends of the measure to raise discussion; nor those opposed. I do not believe that any discussion will change a single vote. It is an old and venerable custom, and ought to be sustained; but we only want a silent vote on the question.

Mr. CHAPEL said—Mr. President, as a general thing, I am a very quiet and peaceable man; but I am not disposed to hold my peace, and have this matter smuggled through. We came here to revise the constitution and do away with abuses. Take, sir, the last legislative session of 85 days; it makes 170 days services in the House and Senate, for services of chaplains; it amounts to some $500. I ask, what services were rendered to the public for that amount of money?

The opening of the session, I admit, does not delay business much; it is only four and a half or five minutes daily. The time occupied during a session would be about fourteen hours. But I ask, sir, what does it cost the State? It will amount to thirty-six dollars for every hour's service; and this to be paid by the State. In the opinion of several delegates, the section is right; but I do not think it is in accordance with the wishes of the people. I do not think it is necessary to pay any person three dollars for five minutes' services. Show me the man that is willing to pay at that rate for the services of the clergy, and I will show you a man that would go for the union of church and State. I do not believe the people of Michigan ask it. I believe in prayer. I believe it is salutary on us as a Christian people. I am willing, in my individual capacity, to do as much as any other gentleman on the subject; but when they would smuggle this through the Convention, and appropriate the sum of thirty-six dollars for prayer, every hour, I am opposed to it as extraordinary compensation for very small services, and they merely for the benefit of a small portion of the community. I am willing and anxious to pay the clergymen who officiate here, out of my own pocket, rather than make an appropriation out of the public treasury; and I think if we pay them a dollar a day, it will be enough. Are we not patriotic enough to take out of our own pockets a few dimes to pay them?

Adopt this article in the constitution, and you will have extraordinarily high-mind men—men of liberal education—seeking this office. But the politicians will ascertain whether the Methodists, or the Presbyterians, or any other denomination, are the strongest, and they will vote accordingly. It will occupy three days every session, before it will be decided who shall open the house with prayer. It is an illegitimate thing, and has cost the State more money than any other abuse.

Let us cut off this appendage. I think it will not injure any conscientious man. Some worthy men here contend for the principle without looking at its effect or its bearing on the State. Some men are disposed to make themselves publicly pious. They wish to appear pious all over the State. I ask to be placed on a level. I am willing to have prayer, and to pay for it; but, sir, I am not willing it should be paid for out of the public treasury.

Mr. WOODMAN—I feel a great deal of deference for my venerable colleague, though we differ so much in opinion on this question. I am sorry to see a disposition to spring the previous question upon it. I am one of those who want to discuss the principle before the vote is taken, and I was desirous that the afternoon should be taken for the discussion.

Sir, it is a great principle that is involved, and it should be well considered before it is fixed in the constitution. It is whether money shall be taken from the treasury for religious purposes or not. I am not disposed to be brought in among those whom my friend [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH] would represent as opposed to religion or religious institutions. I am orthodox in sentiment; but I do not think it right to tax a portion of the people to pay for persons coming in here to pray. I believe it is unconstitutional under the constitution of the United States.

I believe it is opposed by clergymen and religious men in the State. A clergyman, respectable and high minded, one who stands high in his profession—I will name him, Mr. Jacobes, of Northville—expressed his opinion to me that it ought to be fixed in this constitution that the Legislature should be prohibited from paying for the services of a chaplain out of the public treasury; and he was further opposed to ministers of the gospel being eligible to State offices.

What will be the effect under the present substitute? Does it prohibit the Legislature from employing a chaplain? Not at all. I am in favor of having a chaplain, but I am in favor of paying him out of my own pocket, and not charging it upon the tax payers of the State. Men of integrity, capacity and standing in the State are opposed to it.

When I received a nomination, I was called out on this question, and I distinctly stated that I was opposed to the employment of a chaplain in the Legislature, to be paid for out of the public treasury; and that I would use my influence in this Convention to have an article inserted in the Constitution that should settle this question definitely. I do not believe that a majority of the orthodox religious community wish to see the ministers of religion demeaning themselves by soliciting the members of the Legislature for their votes for the office of chaplain. If we pay them ourselves they will not come here to solicit votes for the office.

If there be a majority of Methodists in the Legislature, there will be a Methodist chaplain; if a majority of Presbyterians, there will be a Presbyterian chaplain. We have now four different chaplains. Is there anything wrong in that? Why do you wish us to pay money for that which we are opposed to? We do not wish to hinder them from employing a chaplain. I think my friend from Monroe does not seriously think it will prevent a chaplain being employed in the State Prison.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The words are "to pay chaplains." It is probable that it will exclude the appointment of a chaplain to the State prison.

Mr. WOODMAN—I think the old constitution is sufficiently explicit; but they came here and discussed the matter every session. I want to put in a clause to say they shall not pay it out of the public treasury, so as to cut of the whole matter.

The Convention then adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The consideration of the unfinished business of the morning was resumed.

The question being upon the amendment proposed by Mr. McCLELLAND, the same was agreed to.

The amendment to the section (28th) was then concurred in by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Barnard, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Carr, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hascall, Hathaway, Kingsley, Kinne, Mosher, Newberry, Mowry, O'Brien, Orr, Redfield, Roberts, Rix Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Town, Walker, Warden, Wells, Willard, Woodman—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Backus, Bagge, H. Bartow, Beeson, Butterfield, Chandler, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Danforth, Daniels, Gibson, Hart, Harvey, Hixon, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Morrison, Moore, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wait, Webster, White, Whittemore, Williams, Witherell, President—40.

The amendments made in committee to sections 29, 32, 33 and 34 were severally concurred in.

The amendment to section 36 being under consideration,

Mr. McCLELLAND said he was opposed to fixing the first Wednesday of February as the time for the meeting of the Legislature, except the first session. The reasons he had assigned before were good now. The reason why it should be fixed to commence in February the first session, was that Congress may not pass the apportionment bill till near the close of the session. It might not be obtained before the Legislature adjourned.

Mr. CRARY—The apportionment bill has fixed the ratio. When we know the census, that is all we want.

Mr. McCLELLAND—We know they may change it.

Mr. COOK moved to amend by striking out "February," where it last occurs, and inserting "January" in lieu thereof.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The session of the Legislature may close before they know what has been done with the apportionment bill in Congress. Suppose the Legislature meets on the 4th day of January, with a session of sixty days, they will adjourn as soon as Congress, and may not know what number of representatives has been apportioned to Michigan. The next Legislature will have to fix the districts; and it may be necessary for the Governor to call an extra session to make the apportionment.

The amendment prevailed.

Mr. CHURCH moved further to amend, by inserting after the word "January," the words "in 1852."

Mr. C. said he would barely remark that he would have the Legislature meet in '51 and '52, and biennial sessions thereafter. He was certain that a session in '51 and '52 would be required if biennial sessions were had afterwards.

Mr. McCLELLAND—The first objection is, that you elect a year before the Legislature meet—another is that the members should come fresh from the people. They have long enough time between November and January to learn how to discharge their duties when they come here. Another reason: Casualties may occur between the election and the meeting of the Legislature. Another: The Governor would not meet the Legislature for twelve months after he was sworn into office, although the Legislature have to decide who is elected.

The sixth objection is, that influences may be brought to bear on the members which could not, if elected in the November previous to the meeting of the Legislature.

The seventh objection is, that the census will come wrong if the Legislature meet in the same year they now do.

The reasons in favor, are: By postponing the meeting after the election, you would enable a member to prepare himself for the duties of his situation. That has been a great evil—persons uninformed coming here. It takes time to learn the rules. Another reason is, as the Governor would have been in office one year, he would be better able to give information in relation to public affairs.

Third. The persons elected in single districts will mingle with the people, and come fresh from them.

Fourth. A provision is made for casualties and deaths.

Fifth. They will not be subject to those malign influences when they come here, if you elect them a year before; because if they turn their attention to the matter, they will be better prepared for legislation, and will act better than when uninformed, as influences at home will be of no effect. It is when they come here that they are open to temptation. With biennial sessions, you will be under the necessity of having occasionally an extra session.

But the treasury is running in debt constantly. There is no money in the treasury; it is running in debt for paying the Convention. It has had to make an arrangement with the Phoenix Bank in New York, for the payment of the interest on the State debt, due in July, to the amount of $14,000.

In my opinion (said Mr. McC.) it would be impolitic to have a session of the Legislature in 1852. If we have, we must cease paying interest on our debt, or lay an additional State tax; or the members of the Legislature when they come here in 1852, will have to go back without pay. It will be of more importance to our character as a State to go on and pay the interest on our debt, and relieve the people from taxation. You may lengthen the session of '51 if you please, but I believe sixty days will be sufficient time to enable them to alter the laws in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution.

Mr. CHURCH—My proposition is to have two consecutive sessions. It had no reference to the time between a member being elected, and attending in this room; but in reference to the mass of business that must necessarily be thrown upon the Legislature by this Convention. The next session is limited to sixty days. Gentlemen knowing the usual delays in the beginning of a session, must know that it will not be long enough. The great alterations made in the Constitution will require corresponding alterations in the laws. Another reason is, provision must be made for our State debt, during the next session of the Legislature. You will find, I will venture to predict, that in the session of '51 there will be more business before the Legislature than can be disposed of.

I regret, sir, (said Mr. C.) that the Convention has met at this time. I did not wish to see it till after the apportionment of 1850. If we had met then, the new counties would have taken their business into their own hands. The radical change we have gone into in the Constitution will require such a change in the laws as cannot be made safely, in haste.

Mr. COOK—There is another reason in regard to the election of a United States Senator. The term of one of our Senators expires in '51. That will be provided for in the next Legislature. The term of the next will expire in March, 1853. I would wish to keep them on to the same time of election to this office.

Mr. BRITAIN—They can elect a year earlier than usual.

Mr. COOK—It will be the case in every election; their terms will expire in an even year.

Mr. BRITAIN—If it be an inconvenience to the State by the election of two persons eighteen months before the time of meeting, how then will it be if the whole Legislature be elected some fourteen months before they meet? There is one observation of the gentleman from Monroe I would notice. He says they will not be corrupted at home; but, sir, may not public sentiment change? and will those persons follow in the train of public sentiment? I want to see the Legislature fresh from the people. Having the Representatives elected a short time previous to the session will be the best means of securing in them the opinions of their constituents.

Mr. BUSH said, sixty days may be long enough to revise the laws, in accordance with the Constitution, but all experience goes against such a supposition. The gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] is a man of industry, and I think of integrity, but he and his colleagues sat ninety days, in 1843. In 1842, the Legislature sat forty-seven days, and they went home with popularity on their heads; but in three years everything they did was repealed. They worked hastily; and in consequence of that, crude and undigested laws were thrown upon the people. If you limit the time of the next session, and do not allow them to meet in '52, there will be crude and undigested legislation, which will cost the State more than the interest on the State debt for one year.

I call (said Mr. B.) on the gentleman to go in for two dollars a day. You will in that way save the amount to pay the interest, and the people will be as well served. I ask the gentleman to say from his experience, when the Legislature hurried through, if it was not doubly expensive, from the necessity of correcting their crude legislation. It is the quality and not the quantity of the legislation that ought to be considered. Our statutes must be changed in every article. When we see how much time it takes to fix an article here, we may judge of the inability to get through with the mass of business that will come before them, in sixty days. I would extend it to ninety days, and if necessary reduce the pay to two dollars a day.

Mr. N. PIERCE said he saw no occasion for holding a session of the Legislature in 1852. They may not be able to get through all the laws; but the Legislature may be called together again if necessary. He (Mr. P.) saw no good reason for changing the policy of biennial sessions. That policy should be pursued which will lessen expense. Sixty days will be long enough. We have laws enough to satisfy the people for the next ten years. I don't think the people can afford to pay for new laws. They do not want them.

Mr. McCLELLAND said he knew when there was no limit to the session of Congress they continued till the dog days, or till some fatal disease drove them from the Capitol. In short sessions they did more business, and did it better and more satisfactory to the public, than when they remained eight or nine months.

In this State the sessions have been protracted; and why? Because the sessions were not limited. Sir, (said Mr. McC.) I have never been in a Legislature yet, in which we could not have done the business in half the time, if the members had been so disposed. With regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. BUSH,] I would say, that if I wanted to come here again to the Legislature, I might go for two dollars a day. But I do not; and I would say that three dollars a day is not too much. Many of our members would not be paid, if five dollars a day were allowed; but to replenish the treasury I would go for it.

Mr. BACKUS said—Mr President: I see no reason for the change proposed to be made. If you fix the time for them to act, I can say from my own experience, there is more business done, well or ill, towards the close of the session than in two-thirds of the entire session. The public sentiment requires you to fix the sessions of our Legislature biennially; and unless some overwhelming reasons are given, I shall give my vote in favor of biennial sessions.

It is said we must call the Legislature together in '52, because there will not be time in the session of '51 to fix up our laws in accordance with the Constitution. Sir, if you fix forty days, every one will be fixed up; and so of ninety days. If you retain it as it is, more good will result than mischief can ensue. Most of our laws can be easily adapted to the changes which have been made, or will be made in our Constitution, unless some more radical changes should be made. If it should be found necessary, the Governor can call an extra session on his own responsibility; but do not make a promise to the ear and break it to the hope. Do not fix biennial sessions, and then call the Legislature together in 1851 and 1852.

Mr. S. CLARK—It does not involve the principle of biennial sessions. The reason assigned is, that a great amount of legislation will be required on account of the alterations made in the Constitution. I do not consider the argument to be of great force. But there is another objection arising from the length of time between the election and members taking their seats. I would not put, with my consent, any provision in the Constitution that shall require our members of the Legislature to be elected fourteen months before they take their seats. On looking back, gentlemen must come to the conclusion that influences have been brought to bear on the Legislature. We have large corporations in the State; if they have not brought influences to bear upon the Legislature to promote their own advantages, they may do so; and it would be improper to allow them to travel through the State for fourteen months to influence the members.

Mr. N. PIERCE—It seems to me the reasoning is all wrong; that if it be dangerous to elect a man a long time before he takes his seat, then it is wrong to elect our Senators for a long period. He never heard of their being corrupted.

Mr. COOK would ask his friend, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] who was elected to Congress one year before he took his seat, if in that time he was corrupted?

Mr. S. CLARK—That is not to the point. I would ask if there were not influences brought to bear in relation to railroad interests at the last session of the Legislature? They controlled the public press and the leading men throughout the State. I would ask if circumstances of that kind might not again occur? and if so, would it be proper to allow them so long a time to operate upon members of the Legislature?

Mr. WITHERELL said nine-tenths of his constituents were in favor of biennial sessions. He should endeavor to carry out their wishes. One reason given in favor of the proposition of having a session in '51 and '52, was that in the next session they would not have time to adapt the laws to the alterations made in the Constitution.

There was a proposition which had struck him forcibly—that this Convention should appoint a Commissioner to adapt the laws previous to the meeting of the Legislature. If that were adopted, forty days would be amply sufficient time for the next Legislature to continue in session.

With regard to the pay of members, he had been of opinion that two dollars a day would be sufficient. Two dollars would not pay some men for their services; but two dollars would be more than many, and perhaps a majority, could earn. He [Mr. W.] should vote, when the question arose, to reduce the salaries in every practicable form; and the members of the Legislature should contribute their mite for the benefit of the treasury.

The yeas and nays being ordered upon Mr. CHURCH's motion, it was negatived:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Bush, Church, Crouse, Fralick, Hanscom, Lee, Prevost, Roberts, Sullivan, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh—12.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, Orr, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Tiffany, Town, Wait, Walker, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman, President—74.

The amendment of the committee was then concurred in.

The amendment made to section 37 was also concurred in.

Section 38 being under consideration,

Mr. STOREY submitted the following substitute for the same:

"Sec. 38. The Legislature shall pass no law creating or authorizing a State paper, but shall provide for the publication of all acts of a general nature in all the newspapers of the State, under such regulations and for such compensation as may be provided by law."

Mr. EATON asked a division of the question.

The yeas and nays being ordered,

Mr. STOREY said the subject had been fully discussed when under consideration in committee of the whole; he, therefore, rose merely to make a statement in regard to the expense of publication. That matter, he believed, was not well understood. He [Mr. S.] had examined the acts of last winter, and found that there were only 40 pages of general laws. The compensation which the printers would probably be paid, would perhaps be forty cents per folio page. If there were forty papers in the State, the publication of the laws in those papers would cost about six hundred dollars.

The cost of the publication of the session laws of 1849 was nine hundred and forty-three dollars, twenty eight cents; so that doing away with that mode of publication, and publishing the general laws in the several papers of the State, which, with biennial sessions, would be once in two years, there would be an annual saving of seven hundred dollars.

Mr. WELLS—What does the gentleman mean by "several?"

Mr. STOREY—It includes the whole of the papers published in the State. He had no objection to alter the phraseology if that term did not fully convey the meaning. He hoped, at least, the section would be stricken out. If it were retained in the Constitution, whatever the exigency of the case might be, the State could not secure the publication of a law in a newspaper.

A division of the question was asked by Mr. EATON, and the motion to strike out was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Beeson, Church, Crary, Eastman, Edmunds, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Hascall, Kingsley, Lee, Lovell, McClelland, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, White, Whipple, Williams—28.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, J. Clark, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Daniels, Desnoyer, Dimond, Eaton, Fralick, Gale, Graham, Green, Hart, Harvey, Hathaway, Hixon, Kinne, Marvin, Mason, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Sturgis, Town, Wait, Walker, Webster, Wells, Whitemore, Willard, Woodman, President—60.

The question bring on concurring in the amendment made in committee of the whole,

Mr. J. D. PIERCE said it would be one of the most singular positions a Legislature could be placed in. They could make laws, but could make no provision for their publication, no matter what might be the circumstances of the State, or however important it may be for the benefit of the people. It was astonishing to him that such a provision should be placed in the Constitution.

Mr. N. PIERCE did not understand that the laws were not going to be published, because they were not going to be published in a newspaper. There has been a large sum paid for publishing in a newspaper, which had been of no benefit to him. If the gentleman could make them all read them, it would be very well. When the gentleman published a newspaper on education, it was not read by the people. We have not come here, (said Mr. P.) to change the government, but to stop the holes in the old Constitution—to stop certain leaks which the people complain of.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I was opposed to the amendment, and am opposed to this proposition. This article provides that the Legislature shall have the power to pass an act or general law, and make it take effect immediately after its passage. If we do not allow the Legislature to publish the laws in some other way than in pamphlet form, rank injustice may be perpetrated in the State. Our laws are not distributed in pamphlet form for five or six months after their passage; and unless you have some communication with the people of the State, it will be impossible for them to know the laws till they feel, by sad experience, the power of them.

I think (said Mr. McC.) we may trust this to the Legislature. Much has been spent by their publication in the State paper, but in abolishing that, we should guard against what might have a tendency to oppress the people. If gentlemen want to abolish the office of State printer, I have no objection; or to confine the publication of the laws to one paper, or in any other way by which we can communicate to the people the laws, before the publication in book form. Though I would go for saving all we can I would not do any thing that would injure the people of the State.

Mr. HANSCOM was in favor of striking out; he would leave it to the Legislature. The argument of the gentleman from Monroe should be conclusive on the minds of members. The Legislature may pass acts which may affect the lives, property and reputation of every man, and which may go into effect immediately on the signature of the Governor, and yet we prohibit their publication. The gentleman from Calhoun says he does not read the newspapers.

Mr. N. PIERCE—I read a dozen of them.

Mr. HANSCOM—Well, he said they were not read. Sir, there is hardly a person arrived at the age of a dozen years, but what reads a newspaper. It is the most effectual way of getting the people acquainted with the laws, having them published in the papers. Who reads the laws in book form? It is only general laws that we propose to publish, and they should be published extensively within the State. I supposed it was the object to get the people acquainted with the laws as soon as they took effect. There have been great complaints made among the people that, before they could know the laws, they were repealed. I believe this should be put a stop to. We should leave to the Legislature at least the power to give to the people all the information they can through the newspapers.

Mr. HASCALL did not know that it would be necessary to publish all the general laws. As a publisher, he had been called upon by the State to publish several acts; those which the people ought to be acquainted with before they went into operation, such as tax laws and the one calling the Convention. There may be some such laws which it would be proper and necessary to publish; but with regard to the whole of the general laws, he was not prepared to say that they ought to be published in the papers.

Mr. WHIPPLE—It seems necessary that some plan should be devised, that the people should become acquainted with the laws. The pamphlet laws are not published for several months after the close of the session. But, sir, is it the fact that the laws do not reach the people of the State? To whom are they sent? To our State, county, and township officers. If I comprehend the force of the argument, the people must find out what the laws are. I know no way but this: that a person bound by the laws, must go to our public offices and read them there. Every person is bound to know the law—the code civil and criminal; and he should have an opportunity of knowing it.

He [Mr. W.] would not be much frightened about the expense. If some fair and honorable principle could be adopted, by which they could be published, he should go for it. But there might be a limitation. It would not be necessary to publish all the general laws; there are some of them which it is not necessary to publish; but those laws which define the rights of persons—which affect vitally their interests—that come home to the hearths of our citizens—should we deprive them of the means of becoming acquainted with these? If they would adopt a proposition of some character that would meet the objection at a small expense, he would go for it. If not, he would leave it open to the Legislature.

Mr. BACKUS believed if the section were left as it came from the hands of the committee of the whole, the Legislature would consider it imperative to have the whole of the general laws published in pamphlet form and published throughout the State.

Newspapers publish general intelligence, and they will not forego it. They publish the laws as convenience should seem to dictate, and they frequently do not publish them for six months after they are published in book form. If it be left to the newspapers to publish the general laws, it will be found a broken reed. Many of the newspapers have a small circulation.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the amendment was amended by adding thereto the following:

“Except for the publication of such general laws as are, by the direction of the Legislature, to take effect within less than ninety days after the passage thereof.”

The amendment made in committee was then concurred in as amended, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyer, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Graham, Green, Hart, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, Mason Morrison, Mosher, N. Pierce, Prevost, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Tiffany, Town, Walker, Warden, Webster, Whipple, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvord, H. Bartow, Asahel Brown, Church, Cook, Crary, Daniels, Eastman, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Hanscom, Harvey, Lovell, McClelland, Moore, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, Roberts, Robertson, Rix Robinson, Soule, Story, Sullivan, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Wells, White, Whittemore, President—32.

Mr. MASON moved to adjourn, but the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. HANSCOM moved that the article entitled "Legislative Department" be re-committed to the committee on that department, with instructions to amend the same as follows, and report said article back to the Convention forthwith, viz:

1. Strike out section 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The number of Representatives shall not exceed eighty, nor be less than fifty, to be elected by single districts and for two years. The Senate shall consist of twenty-four members, to be elected in such manner and for such term as may be prescribed by law."

2. Amend section 3 by striking out the following:

"Provided, That each county having an organized county government, and the territory attached thereto, shall be entitled to one Representative," and insert as follows: "Provided, That each county whose organization on the first day of January, A. D. 1851, shall have been perfected by election of county officers, shall be entitled to at least one Representative."

3. Strike out section 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The State shall be divided into Senate districts; and in the formation of Senate districts no county shall be divided."

4. Strike out of section 15 the words "two-thirds," and insert "a majority," where the words occur in the section.

5. Strike out all of section 17, up to and including the word "thereafter, in the 3d line, and insert the following:

"Compensation of the members of the Legislature shall not exceed three dollars per day for actual attendance, unless absent by reason of sickness; and after the session of 1851, such compensation shall not extend beyond the first sixty days of the session."

6. Amend section 20 by striking out the words, at the end of the section, "and for one year thereafter."

7. Amend section 23 by striking out the words "all the members elected to," in the 3d and 4th lines of said section.

8. Strike out of section 25 all after the words "by law," in the 5th line, down to and including the word "oath," at the end of the 17th line.

9. Strike out section 38, and insert as follows:

"All general laws shall be published in two of the newspapers having the largest circulation published in the city of Detroit, and also in the newspaper having the largest circulation published at the seat of government of the State."

Mr. HANSCOM moved to adjourn; when, by consent, the President announced the following committee, under the resolution of Mr. WOODMAN, this morning:

MESSRS. WOODMAN, BACKUS, ROBERTS, WILLIAMS, COMSTOCK, WHIPPLE, BUTTERFIELD, RIX ROBINSON, KINGSLEY.

The motion to adjourn was lost; but after some discussion, on motion of Mr. ROBERTS, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, (31st day,) July 16.

The Convention was called to order at half-past seven o'clock, by the PRESIDENT.

PETITIONS.

By Mr. HASCALL: the argument of Joseph Miller, Jr., and others, members of the Kalamazoo bar, requesting their delegation to use their efforts in favor of an independent Supreme Court.

Laid on the table.

The Convention having arrived at the order of unfinished business, resumed the consideration of "Article —, Legislative Department."

The question being upon the motion of Mr. HANSCOM to re-commit with instructions, it was by consent passed over.

The question then being on concurring in the amendment made in the committee of the whole, striking out section 39, which was as follows:

"Sec. 39. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act to grant any license for the sale of ardent spirits or other intoxicating liquors as a drink or beverage;"

Mr. MASON said he had hoped to hear this question fully discussed. He did not propose to make a speech himself, but would be glad to hear some of the friends of the temperance cause give their views on the matter. For himself, he was in favor of retaining the section as reported in the article, and trusted the Convention would arrive at the same conclusion. At the time of the passage of the license laws, he opposed them on the principle that their tendency would be to disturb the peace and harmony of the community, to create disturbance among society, and to exert an undue influence on elections.

The sale of ardent spirits should not be regulated by law. If the traffic were a great evil, instead of being regulated, or even countenanced by the statutes of our State, it should be prohibited. He was ready to vote for its prohibition; but if the friends of temperance could not obtain this, they would take what a majority of the members chose to grant.

It had been argued against the repeal of the license system, that the income derived from it in Detroit was large. Members ought not to be influenced by any consideration of that kind in voting on the question. It was the price of blood, and on the same principle brothels, gambling houses, lotteries, or any other vice in community, could be licensed by the Legislature. He thought public opinion should control this matter, as it did other pernicious practices; and if so, it should be left free—beyond the power of the Legislature to sanction it. When the town authorities granted license for the sale of ardent spirits, they gave respectability and character to the traffic under the law. He would ask why this should be made a legal transaction, and men of good moral character be authorized to exercise the exclusive privilege of selling poison? It was a disgrace to our statutes, and should be wiped off.

He hoped, at least, that some provision would be introduced to prevent its interference in elections. Besides the evils of the license system in this respect, it operated unequally in others. Some towns refused to grant licenses, while others adjoining voted a license to sell. He hoped the question would not be passed on until duly considered.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH moved to amend the section by striking therefrom the words "drink or beverage," and inserting the following: "except for mechanical or medicinal purposes; and all traffic in said articles is hereby forever prohibited except for the purposes aforesaid."

Mr. VAN V. said—Mr. President: I present this amendment to section 39, for incorporation in our Constitution, from a conviction that the section reported by the committee will not effect the object desired, and that nothing short of my amendment will satisfy the friends of reform. One of the most powerful causes which have operated in calling this Convention has been the public debt, and the oppressive taxes under which we groan; and that man who shall successfully propose a remedy for these evils will but promote the object of his mission here.

Now, sir, I propose to prove to this Convention, that if these legalized fountains of iniquity which are now sending forth their streams of death throughout our State, prostrating in their course all that is fair and lovely, and of good report, can be dried up; if these streams which are now sweeping over the land, exhausting its resources, multiplying the widows and the fatherless, spreading desolation and destruction in their course, can be stayed, and the money thus worse than squandered, turned into the treasury, our State debt would soon be liquidated, and there would be no more complaining of exorbitant taxes and hard times. One of the most prolific sources of poverty and woe would be removed, and our State present an enviable example of independence and prosperity. We believe, sir, there is not in the wide world a more destructive agent—a more insatiate monster than Alcohol. Men of genius, of talent, of intellect, have fallen, sadly fallen from high stations of honor to the degradation of the drunkard, and become a hissing, and a bye-word to all who knew them. This insatiate monster has invaded the sacred desk, and hung the church of the living God with the habiliments of mourning; he has tarnished the lustre of the emine, and perverted the streams of justice. Men of the profoundest literature, of giant intellect, of boundless acquirements, have been degraded into raving maniacs, into living masses of putrid death. But to the law and the testimony. Wine is a mocker—strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath contentions? Who hath wounds without cause? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that seek mixed wine. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup—when it moveth itself aright. At the last, it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. And its maddening bite transforms the man into a maniac, and its deadly sting sends him reeling to perdition.

Our penitentiaries, our jails and mad-houses are standing witnesses against alcohol in all its varied forms. The bloated, reeling drunkard, the cheerless hearth, the broken-hearted wife, the homeless orphan, the yawning grave which annually swallows up its 30,000 victims, all call upon us with resistless eloquence to stretch forth our hands in staying this torrent of wretchedness and woe. And shall we turn a deaf ear to the cry of the afflicted—shall we not stand up manfully here, and cast our vote in favor of a measure which promises so much to our fellow men? A friend of my youth was recently stricken down in the vigor of manhood, with the mania potu. He was a lawyer of eminence in his profession; a man of strong mind and brilliant intellect, whose kind heart and social qualities had endeared him to a large circle of friends. He indulged in the social glass, and fell a victim to intemperance. In his mad ravings, he called upon a brother, a clergyman long since dead, who had often attempted to arrest his progress on the road to ruin: "brother Benjamin, help! help!" he cried; but there was no help for the poor man; he drop't into the drunkards grave, and has gone to the drunkards doom. Could his heart-broken wife, as she looked down into that grave, have indulged the hope that his miseries were then ended, it had indeed been a drop of consolation in her cup of woe. But intemperance kills beyond the grave. The portals of Heaven are forever closed against the poor inebriate; for it is written with the finger of God, no drunkard shall enter there. The records of eternity alone can number the sighs and tears and blood levied by this foe to human weal. The fairest buds of promise have been blasted, the strength and beauty of manhood prostrated, and the blossoms of old age withered.

Sir, of all the scourges which have afflicted the human family, none have been more potent than alcohol, none more efficient in marring, blighting, and destroying human happiness than this monster. Tell me not of the sword or the pestilence; the freed spirits of the men who fall their victims may ascend to dwell with angels; but the doom of the poor drunkard is irrevocably fixed. And shall we be accessory to all the misery produced by this nefarious traffic? Shall we forbear to use our influence to do all in our power to stay this tide of wretchedness?

And what is the argument urged by the enemies of this proposition? They tell us it is a custom sanctified by long years gone by; that it produces a revenue to the treasury; that the license law contains salutary and necessary restraints to regulate the sale. But, sir, does long usage sanctify sin? Because we have for these many years violated the law of reason and of God, shall we continue to do so? Or shall we not repudiate what we know to be wrong, and forever inhibit a traffic which is productive of evil, and only evil? Who does not know, Mr. President, that for every dollar put into the treasury by the sale of licenses, fifty or one hundred are abstracted in the way of poor taxes, criminal prosecutions, and the thousand other expenses consequent upon this business? Prohibit this traffic—say that no more alcohol shall be sold in this State except for medicinal and mechanical purposes—and you do more for the prosperity of our State, you do more for the cause of humanity, to dry up the burning tide of woe, and allay human suffering in its ten thousand forms, than you could do by any and all other provisions we might incorporate in our constitution.

I appeal to gentlemen upon this floor to aid me in this measure. I ask you as patriots and as christians, as men who love your fellow men and would promote their welfare, to aid us. Give us your countenance and your vote. Let it not be said that any sinister or political motive has prevented us from doing our duty. Let us place this prohibition in our organic law, and secure to ourselves the blessing of the widow and the fatherless, and the approval of our God.

Mr. TIFANY suggested the propriety of deferring action on the question until the report of the special committee on the subject was before the Convention.

Mr. MASON had no objection to that course. He would be very glad if the subject could be postponed until the report of that committee.

Mr. BAGG said the proposition, as originally reported by the committee, was just about what was wanted. He [Mr. B.] was a St. Paul man. He hoped that those who wished to prosper the cause would now come up manfully to the work and assist in getting rid of the odious license system.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that one of the principal reasons assumed for the late adjournment was, that members might consult their constituents and ascertain what public opinion was. So far as he had found it, he would say that it approved of most of the steps that had been taken by this Convention. But the only case in which disapprobation was manifested, was in regard to our having expunged the section of this article, suggested by the gentleman from Wayne. There was some doubt expressed the other day, as to whether the temperance men desired to have this article incorporated into the Constitution. He would say that he was not a member of any temperance society, or of the "Sons of Temperance;" and he would speak here what he believed to be the sentiments of his constituents, independent of their being temperance or anti-temperance in their views. They desired to have this section incorporated. The Legislature heretofore, in regard to this subject, had violated all the principles which controlled legislation. The Legislature had imposed no license upon men engaged in any other business, which he now recollected, with the exception of pedlars, who were taxed some small amount, in the shape of a license, for the reason, he supposed, that they were men flitting to and fro, enjoying the benefit of our roads and our laws, and the protection of our judicial establishments, without bearing any part of the burden of our taxation. License laws were inoperative. Vote "No License" or "License," and in most parts of the State they were a dead letter. Why then allow the Legislature to adopt laws relative to this trade, which it never adopts concerning your trade or mine? They were worse than a dead letter. Attempt to put them in operation in a township, and the peace and tranquility of the community, the political, the social and family relations of the citizens were disturbed.

The system was a nuisance in any shape, as well as corrupt. It was a compromise with crime, if it were anything. If we aimed at a disreputable trade, as was contended by some, then let us not put money in our treasury derived from such a source. As the gentleman from St. Clair [Mr. MASON] remarked, "why not give a license for other offences? Why not license gambling houses, lotteries, &c., &c.," as they did in France, and exact revenue of all those kind of establishments which he would not name?

In regard to revenue, in the first place a great share of those who took licenses evaded and never paid the tax. If the tax was paid, how stands debit and credit between society and the system? A gentleman in his county took the trouble to examine the records for the purpose of ascertaining the expense of pauperism and crime entailed upon the county by the sale of ardent spirits, and the amount paid in for licenses granted for the sale of liquor. It was found that the expense incurred was a thousand dollars, at least, per annum; while the amount paid for licenses was a mere pittance.

However, his opinion was simply this: If the sale of ardent spirits be respectable and right, the business ought to be open to all, without restriction; and if it be wrong and disreputable, the occupation ought not to be compromised with, in any wise. He conceived that the sentiment of his part of the State was, to have the section incorporated as it stood in the original report.

Mr. MORRISON called for a division of the question. He wished to have the question disposed of. If the select committee on the subject chose to bring in a report, there was no necessity why it should conflict with the section the Convention might then adopt; or if they thought proper to report a separate article, there could be no objection.

Mr. EATON was in favor of the provision as reported by the committee. He hoped that the motion to strike out would not be concurred in, with the exception of the words, "as a drink or beverage." He could testify, with the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] as to what public opinion was in his [Mr. E's] part of the country. Every man with whom he had conversed was in favor of the measure—even those engaged in the sale of ardent spirits. If the sale of liquor were an evil, why take pay for it? We might as well license any other evil as to license this; and he considered this one of the greatest evils abroad in the land. He was even opposed to licensing it for mechanical purposes; for in that way people could get it, and thus perpetuate the evil. He thought the amendment of the gentleman from Oakland was going too far—further than the Convention, perhaps, was willing to go. He referred to prohibiting the making or vending of liquor. As had been said on a previous occasion, “half a loaf is better than no bread.” He was content to have the words “drink or beverage” stricken out.

Mr. WITHERELL desired to offer a few remarks in relation to the manner in which the law would stand, if this provision were sustained and the Constitution adopted. The law at present stood in this form: we now prohibited the sale of ardent spirits without a license, to be granted by the proper authorities. But by this provision there would be a constitutional prohibition against the licensing, and consequently against the sale of ardent spirits. The sale of liquor could not be had within the State, lawfully; the law prohibiting it without a license, and the power to grant a license being taken away. The law would stand in that manner until the Legislature came to take action on the subject. And when they did take action, they would find in the Constitution an inhibition to sell ardent spirits. They would look then for their powers: and what were they? It struck him, with this provision standing in the Constitution, they could do nothing at all. But he was not certain; they might provide that some authorities in towns should regulate the time and place of selling liquor, under certain penalties. They might say that. So that a certain “place” might be considered as a license—a permission to sell. Then the Legislature would have no power on the subject—they must permit it to be sold at every place and time, at which individuals might think proper to do so.

As to the evil of the sale of this article, he believed there was no difference of opinion about it. He would beg leave, however, to offer a few observations in relation to the connection which had been adverted to by some gentlemen, as existing between intemperance and crime. It had happened in the course of his life, that he had been engaged in the trials of a great many men, for murder; some of whom had paid the forfeit with their lives; others had escaped conviction, and others had been condemned to imprisonment, and imprisoned for life. In the whole of these cases, he had not seen but one or two in which the use of ardent spirits had anything to do with the murder. In all the long catalogue of crime, intemperance was no part of the act, so far as his knowledge extended, unless it were in assaults and batteries, or crimes attended with immediate violence. In such cases as these, intemperance had had much to do. But in burglaries and larcenies, and such crimes as required a cool head to effect them, intemperance had very little to do with them at any time. The men who committed these crimes were, he might say, cool, temperate and sober men. And as he had said before, the crime which was accompanied with immediate violence, was connected with the use of spirituous liquors. Not so in the other cases, so far as his experience went.

However, if we struck out this section, we took from the Legislature the power to control this matter. Every man might ride loose, and all those who felt disposed to extract money from the degradation and the miseries of their fellows, could do so unrestrained, so far as any controlling power could be exercised. He thought it might be debateable whether the Legislature would have the power to restrain or prohibit. But in his mind, unless the Legislature had that power, it would be throwing the reins loose, and would let every man do as he saw fit in his own eye.

Mr. MOORE hoped the subject would be passed over until the select committee made their report. They would present arguments that might satisfy the Convention as to what would be the proper plan to pursue. He did not wish to delay the action or retard the progress of the Convention, but really desired to have this subject postponed until the report of the committee, when the Convention would be prepared to act and vote. If it were dangerous to insert this section in the constitution, or to strike it out, hasty action either way would be improper.

Mr. GALE said he did not intend to discuss the question before the Convention, but there were some points that had not been adverted to, to which he would call attention. What were the practical effects of the license system? What were these license laws worth? They were not of as much value as a humbug.

But he would briefly allude to the remarks of the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. WITHERELL.] That gentleman had certainly obscured the question by his legal argument. He seemed apprehensive the constitution might conflict with the statutes, and, consequently, that a difficulty might arise. We were not adapting the constitution to the present laws, but the laws will have to be adapted to the provisions of the constitution. That gentleman's experience in regard to the connection existing between intemperance and crime, was the very reverse of what he [Mr. G.] had always heard and read. The statistics of crime would refute the argument based on the experience of that gentleman.

But was it the part of the Legislature to enact laws to be violated? And, as he before asked, what were the practical effects of the license system? If a town voted "no license," did it stop the sale of liquor, or even cause a less quantity to be used? No; so far as his experience went, it certainly did not. And when those engaged in selling without license were prosecuted, what was the result? They escaped punishment, managing in some way or other to elude the penalties of the law. At one time in Flint there were a number indicted for selling liquor, and when the trials came on every indictment was quashed. The expense to the town and county was considerable, yet no good resulted. He had been informed by a member from the county of Jackson that in one town they had attempted to enforce the law and put a stop to the sale of ardent spirits, and the result was they had to pay $500 expense, without effecting their purpose. This was but an instance of what occurred in many other places.

No law should be enacted but what was intended to be carried into effect and strictly enforced. By permitting laws to remain on our statute books that were daily unheeded and openly violated, and allowing the persons to escape with impunity, the effect would be to bring all laws into disrepute. Experience in this matter was much better than theory. If they went to work on any fine spun theoretical matter, it would be very apt to lead to a bad result. Experience was the better guide.

Mr. BUTTERFIELD hoped the discussion would not be protracted at this time. There was a manifest impropriety in discussing this matter just now. All the petitions relative to this subject had been referred to a select committee, and that committee had the whole matter under consideration. They were also, so far as he knew, prepared to report in relation to this subject. He thought, then, if gentlemen had any confidence in the committee, they would wait for its report, and not by the action of the Convention, prevent the further action of that committee, and make it in effect a nullity. He hoped, then, that the subject would be postponed. He trusted that he would be found advocating the proposition made by the chairman of that special committee. He represented a particularly temperance community, and he hoped to represent not only his own wishes, but the wishes of his constituents in reference to this subject.

Mr. BAGG said the select committee had never been called together. It might possibly, from the action to-day, be called together, but members thought of going home—of adjourning at some time or other—(a voice, "never,")—and we could not delay action. When he found members differing so widely in opinion as to what kind of a provision should be adopted, he was willing to get rid of the subject at present in the best manner possible.

Mr. BRITAIN—I am aware that so much has been said on this subject, that I do not know if the Convention will give me its attention. I wish to accomplish that which the gentleman last up proposes to accomplish. I propose, however, to do so by means different from those proposed by the gentleman. The Convention, in committee of the whole, struck out the section with the understanding that it should be brought in in a separate article, and submitted to the people; at least, whatever was done upon the subject of selling ardent spirits, was to be in the shape of a separate question, and to be submitted to the people as a separate question. It was with that understanding that I voted for the proposition to strike out. That motion was made by a gentleman distinguished in this body for his support of the temperance reformation. We still desire to adhere to this as the best method of accomplishing the object in view. And here I may be allowed to give the reasons which compel me to differ with some gentlemen who have given their opinions on the subject in this Convention. We are here making a constitution to be submitted to the people for their approbation or disapprobation. I desire to so submit it that it shall be entirely disconnected with any question that would embarrass their judgment and action upon it. I wish to save it from the operation of several fanaticisms. I desire to save it from the fanaticism produced by men who lecture upon temperance as a trade, because it is easier to support themselves in that way than by labor. I desire to save it from the fanaticism produced by the reformed drunkard, who, instead of "repenting in sackcloth and ashes" for his crimes, justifies himself, and, Adam-like, charges the whole fault upon the "rum-seller." I desire to save it from the fanaticism of those moral reformers who, possessing a "zeal which is not according to knowledge," and forgetting the divine injunction "to be subject to the higher powers, for the powers that be are ordained of God," weaken the confidence of the people in the wisdom and integrity of your most patriotic and enlightened statesmen, slander and degrade your laws, and through the license of a temperance lecture, invade the temple of human liberty, and attempt to enthrone therein a tyrant more intolerable than Nero himself.

I desire to save it from ultra republican fanaticism, for instance; or from that kind of fanaticism which is produced through designing political men. I desire, in fine, to free the Constitution from all improper influences; and that can only be done by keeping it unconnected with the question of temperance altogether, and submit that as a separate question for the consideration of the people.

Now, Mr. President, if the Convention will indulge me, I shall briefly present the reasons which induced me to this conclusion. The gentleman from St. Clair [Mr.

Mason] has told us that it is a simple proposition, and a very plain one. "The Legislature shall not have the power to pass any act to grant any license for the sale of ardent spirits, or other intoxicating liquors, as a drink or beverage."

Mr. MASON (in his seat)—I proposed to strike out the words "drink or beverage," and retain the balance of the section.

Mr. BRITAIN—The question, I suppose before the Convention, will be on striking out.

The PRESIDENT—The question is on striking out, a division of the question having been called for.

Mr. BRITAIN—I will beg permission to say a few words on this subject, as I have heretofore waited in silence, not only here, but during the previous session of the Legislature, in relation to this matter. This is the first time that I have made any observations on this subject; not because I did not feel an interest in the subject of temperance, nor because I did not know something about it; but because I was unwilling to trouble the Convention. The motion seems to be, to strike out that part of the proposition which prohibits the Legislature from authorizing the sale of ardent spirits "as a drink or beverage," and in lieu, to insert that it shall not be sold "except for medicinal and mechanical purposes." Now, sir, I am opposed to any one of those different questions being incorporated into this article of the Constitution. If any be incorporated, that one prohibiting the sale of liquor as a "drink or beverage" will be the least objectionable.

The general impression prevailing here appears to be that the license laws are the only authority people have, or have had, to sell liquor. And even when the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. WITHERELL] correctly stated the legal character of the case, gentlemen were unwilling to listen to him. Perhaps they may not be willing to listen to me. I ask now, where is there any prohibition of the sale of ardent spirits except that which is contained in the license laws? What is there to prevent a man from making and selling liquor, as freely as he can raise and sell wheat? I beg leave to assure this Convention that there is no prohibition whatever against selling liqtion, except what is contained in the license laws. Do the people know this? If they do they may be prepared to vote intelligently on the proposition of the gentleman from St. Clair. They do not know it; and when I speak thus, I speak that which I know. For I have been a temperance man a long time. I am a practical temperance man. I belong to all the various temperance organizations—to the Sons of Temperance—to the Washingtonians, and—

(A voice—Do you belong to the “Daughters?”—Laughter.)

Mr. BRITAIN—I have not that pleasure.—(A laugh.) Mr. President, I regret the disposition of some gentlemen to trifle with a subject which is surrounded with more difficulties than any other subject which has been presented to this Convention; but I am not to be drawn from my purpose. I know that the doctrine has been promulgated from one end of the State to the other, by temperance lecturers, that the Legislature which enacted the present license laws were guilty of creating that system under which all the vices of intemperance have been generated. I know this to be so.

Sir, I have heard it from high places, even before the present temperance excitement began. Yes sir, highly intelligent men, without taking the trouble of examining the subject, have drawn the erroneous conclusion that the laws under which all intoxicating liquors were sold were the only authorities for selling them, and that if they were repealed no sales could be made at all; when, in fact, if those laws were repealed any person in the land could make and sell. Under this inexcusable ignorance of the character of the law, there have been good men who have attempted to check the wide spreading evil of intemperance by restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors to a few well regulated houses, and compelling such houses to pay a tax to remunerate the people for maintaining said regulations.

These men, knowing that slander will be more readily received than commendation, have slandered, degraded and abused your laws; yes sir, even those laws which prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to minors and to drunkards, and which entirely prohibit the sale of them late at night and on the Sabbath day, and, in fact, which are the only restrictions upon the unlimited sale of them. Are not these, so far as they go, good and wholesome laws? Perhaps they are not as good as they should be; but they are good laws—they are beneficial regulations, which have no existence except in those laws which prohibit all from selling except those who consent to take a license and submit to such regulations as the law imposes. These are the facts of the case.

But this is said to be “a plain, simple proposition.” Will the people so understand it? You put in your constitution a provision which prohibits the Legislature from licensing the sale of ardent spirits for any purpose whatever; and how many will understand that this proposition authorizes all persons to sell without restriction? And, if so understood, would it be popular on that account?

The temperance lecturers have taught the people all over the country that if you repeal the license laws there will be no authority to sell. Will they turn around and say it is not so? Can they make the people believe it if they do? Sir, they have so long taught the people that but for the license laws no liquor could be sold at all, that they cannot stop the current of public opinion which they have originated. Dare they attempt to stop it? If they do they must be crushed by it. For when public sentiment becomes moving in a certain direction it cannot be trifled with. It is like the flow of a mighty river, which may at last be checked when it meets its ocean, but which cannot be restrained by any impediment thrown in its channel.

We should, then, so far as possible, bring the deliberate opinion of the people to pass upon such propositions as we shall submit to them.

Mr. President, the first constitution of Wisconsin contained liberal exemption provisions and stringent banking provisions. The bankers were displeased with it, and resolved upon procuring its rejection by the people. They did not attack the banking restrictions, but they attacked the exemption privileges, and made thousands believe that the adoption of a constitution with such privileges of exemption would ruin the State. I passed through Wisconsin but a few days previous to the election at which their constitution was rejected, and can therefore speak with confidence respecting it.

The constitution to which I have alluded was rejected. A second constitution was then formed containing provisions nearly similar to those rejected, and submitted to the people in separate propositions. This united the friends of each separate proposition and divided the enemies of the several propositions, and the constitution was adopted. There are thousands of people in Michigan who, regardless of the defects in the constitution, would vote for it merely because it contained this provision; and there are thousands who, regardless of its merits, would vote against it merely because it contained this provision; and certainly, Mr. President, no man of correct moral sentiments can contemplate with pleasure the submission with our constitution of a provision which could with perfect safety be submitted to the people alone, when its submission with the constitution will make thousands vote for or against it without reference to any other provision. But do not suppose that I sanction the sale of ardent spirits as a beverage. When that question comes up my vote will be at hand.

But I am anxious to learn what you propose to do with alcohol. Can you stop the manufacture of it for proper purposes, under the plea that the use of it as a beverage may sometimes occur? If you can, then you can stop the manufacture of iron, because sometimes it is manufactured into a bowie knife, with which life may be taken; or because a pistol made from it may be put to a man's head, and his brains blown out with it. The two cases are alike in character. How could we get along in chemistry or manufactures, without alcohol? The gentleman from Genesee [Mr. GALE] could have told us that you could not make your essences from your vegetable oils—that you cannot reduce your gums, or manufacture your ethers—you cannot manufacture your tinctures without the assistance of alcohol. You may go into a druggist's shop, and ask him how many of his drugs can be made without alcohol, and he will tell you about one-half of them.

(A voice—I did not vote for prohibition.)

Mr. BRITAIN—I was undertaking to show that these things must be made—that this sale must be authorized, because this use of them must be had. Then, if its use must be had, its manufacture and sale must be had, unless the Convention wish to put it back into the hands of the druggists, and let it come into use as a general panacea and family medicine, (laughter) as it was twenty years ago. If it continue to be used, it must continue to be made and sold. Then how do you propose to sell it? You may prohibit the sale of ardent spirits for all except certain uses. You can perhaps do it in that way; and so far I am willing to go. You may then call it what law you please, but it will really be a license law if it permits sales. You may call it a prohibition law; and if the present law had been called a prohibition law, the people would have understood it better than they do now, and would have been better prepared to vote upon the subject than they are now. I will say here, in conclusion, that I cannot go for this proposition, if in any way connected with this constitution, but must have it in a separate article; so that there may be no means of deceiving the people, and that they may vote intelligently on the subject. Whatever the Convention may do, I hope they will concur in the amendment of the committee of the whole. If the special committee to which were referred petitions and resolutions on the subject of temperance, have not as yet considered the subject, it should not affect the question before the Convention, because they may hereafter report. If they do not, they may even be called upon by a resolution to report; and whatever they report may be submitted with the section under consideration as a separate proposition; and even if the committee fail to report altogether, every member must see that it forms no reason why this proposition should not be separately submitted.

Mr. President, I have said nothing of the multiplied evils of intemperance, and why should I? They have been felt by many, witnessed by all, and are desired by none; and I should consider myself wanting in courtesy to the Convention, were I to detain it in attempting to prove the existence of a fact so universally admitted as the degrading, demoralizing and blighting evils of intemperance.

Mr. DANFORTH moved the previous question.

Mr. WELLS—I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion. I desire to make only a few remarks.

Mr. DANFORTH was tired of being bored with speeches on this subject, but he would withdraw the motion to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. WELLS—I rise to call the attention of legal gentlemen, Mr. McClelland, Mr. Crary, the “harvest” gentleman of Wash-tenaw, [Mr. KINGSLEY,] and others, to this point: suppose we embody this section in the Constitution; it relates to future legislation. Suppose the next Legislature refuses to repeal the license laws; will not the same evils exist as at present? The section under consideration does not repeal the license system. Now I wish to know what will be the effect under the supposition I have stated.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—Mr. President: I am sorry to bore the gentleman from Ingham, [Mr. DANFORTH,] but, sir, I feel in duty bound to discuss this question.

I don’t know that I understand the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG,] who calls upon the ultra temperance men to come to the support of his measure. If the gentleman means whole-souled, thorough going, “died in the wool” temperance men. I answer as I have before told the gentleman, if my amendment fails, we shall most cheerfully aid in the adoption of his proposition; as we consider it a great desideratum to cut the State loose from this abominable traffic, and withdraw from it the protection of law, that we may be no more met by the rum-seller’s certificate of good moral character; his argument that he does it under the protection and according to law. I am, sir, for prohibiting at once and forever this abomination, this system of iniquity, and putting it under the proscriptive ban of the law, and place a mark upon the man who, in violation of public opinion and the law, shall still continue this traffic. Why not license other abominations and have the avails in the public treasury? It is, sir, the wages of iniquity, the price of blood, the prolific source of more wretchedness than war or famine; it is daily multiplying the widows, and the fatherless, crushed hearts and blighted hopes, sending the deep wail of sorrow throughout our State, and the land is clad in the habiliments of mourning. And who upon this floor will refuse to record his vote to stay this torrent of wretchedness, and redeem our State from this blighting curse? I trust, sir, my amendment will prevail; that the good sense of this Convention will adopt it; that the friends of reform, while they adopt into the organic law other measures, calculated to advance the interests of the State and the happiness of our constituents, will not fail to sanction this measure, which in my opinion will do more to advance the objects of this Convention than all other measures combined. I say then, sir, to the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. BAGG,] if my amendment does not prevail, I shall most cheerfully aid him in his. First, then, I go for my amendment, not only because it is my child—because I claim the paternity—but because I think it more comely, better calculated to promote the desired object, a more thorough measure of reform demanded by the friends of order and the advocates of virtue. I appeal, then, to the gentleman from Wayne to aid us; to come up to our help; to lend us the aid of his talents, and his influence, to sweep at once this monster evil from our State; let us not stop at any half-way house in this business. Let us be thorough, radical, ultra if you please; and we shall at once bind up the broken-hearted; pour the oil of gladness into the bruised spirit, and wipe the scorching tear from the fevered cheek of disconsolate ones.

The gentleman from Wayne [Mr. EATON] says alcohol is one of the greatest evils in the land, and that it is admitted by every gentleman upon this floor. I am glad to see this monster finds no advocates here; no apologists to screen him from our just indignation. What, then, hinders the accomplishment of our object? I call upon the gentleman from Wayne, I invoke members upon this floor, to aid us, one and all. Come up to the rescue and let us drive this monster from our midst; let us hoot him from the State—haunt him from the world.

Some gentlemen think all that is necessary may be effected by moral suasion, and inquire, will you abandon it? No sir, I answer, no, by no means. For there is hope for the poor inebriate; yes, hope for the degraded drunkard, his heart is not all callous to the call of reason; although degraded and wretched, the deep fountains of sympathy are not all dried up; "he is a man for a' that, for a' that" The kindly influence, the watchful care of those he loves and respects may reclaim him; may bring him back to the path of virtue. Take him, then, kindly by the hand, lift him from the ditch, whisper words of comfort and encouragement in his ear; do all you can by moral suasion, by courtesy and by kindness, to bring him back to the path of virtue; to restore him to himself and to the world; to reinvest him with the spirit of a man. Thousands and thousands more have been redeemed in our own country from the infatuating cup, and now shine among the brightest constellations in the land.

Of the 300,000 sons of temperance in our land, 75,000 are reformed inebriates restored to society and the world, now valiently fighting the battles of temperance. The benign influence of this fraternity has done much, very much, to advance its humane objects. God speed them in their efforts. Use moral suasion, sir? Yes sir, I will with the poor drunkard, "while life and health and being lasts," do all I can to reclaim him from his cups and restore him to himself. Our country abounds with monuments, proud monuments, in favor of moral suasion.

If you have not done so, gentlemen of the Convention, I ask you to read the auto-biography of John B. Gough, who has recently lectured at Detroit—a reformed inebriate, a man who has done more for the reformation of the drunkard, perhaps, than any man now living. Reduced to penury and wretchedness, his broken hearted wife and her infant child both died. He says: "during the miserable hours of darkness I would steal from my lonely bed to the place where my dead wife and child lay, and in agony of soul pass my shaking hand over their cold faces, and then return to my bed after a draught of rum which I had obtained and had hidden under the pillow of my wretched couch." How signally is the wise man's description verified:—"Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of the mart; they have stricken me, thou shalt say, and I was not sick, they have beaten me and I felt it not; when I shall awake I will seek it yet again."

And yet this man, degraded as he was, has been redeemed from the influence of alcohol and is constantly employed for the reformation of the drunkard. But a few years since alcohol was the presiding god every where and on all occasions—in the social circle, in the public gathering, and at the funeral obsequies. So universal was the sale and use of alcohol that the language of the immortal Cowper was literally applicable to us:

"Pass where we may, through city or through town,
Village or hamlet of this merry land,
Though lean and beggared, every twentieth pace
Conducts the unguarded nose to such a whiff
Of stale debauch, forth issuing from the styres
That law hath licensed, as makes temperance reel."

Yes sir, and intemperance rioted through the length and breadth of our land, and spread its dark and dismal pall over all that was fair and lovely and of good report. Where is the State, community, family or individual who has not in some way suffered under this burning, blighting scourge.

I ask gentlemen upon this floor, who of you has not suffered in some way from this giant evil? Who has not in person, in property, in family or friends, mourned over his ravages? Who has not seen the grave close over some loved object, stricken down by this monster? And shall we countenance this traffic? Shall we be content with preventing its legalized sale? Can we do so, and answer to our consciences and our God? The gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] tells us we are all ignorant upon this subject; he tells us there are many salutary provisions enacted to regulate the sale, and restrain the traffic; to prevent the sale on the Sabbath, in the night, to apprentices, &c., &c. And the gentleman fears we are going too far; that public opinion will not sustain us. He tells us, "if public sentiment contains error, we must shape our laws to meet the error." I would ask the gentleman in what school of ethics he has imbibed this doctrine, where his system of morals are inculcated? Abominable! He tells us he is a thorough temperance man, and understands it in its length and breadth; that he is a member of all the temperance societies extant, from the Washingtonians to the Sons of Temperance; and when the gentleman from Geresee rises in his place and tells us he is opposed to prohibiting the sale, the gentleman from Berrien tells him he is glad to hear it, and most eloquently advocates the manufacture and sale. He tells us we must not prohibit the sale; no, by no means. I do not understand these temperance men. I have not so learned temperance. Sir, we owe it to ourselves, to the manufacturers and venders of alcohol, to the world at large, that we adopt this provision in the Constitution. Like the fabled Upas, intemperance is spreading its withering blight on all around, and is the acknowledged cause of more wretchedness and misery than all other causes combined. It arms the midnight robber and the assassin, and speeds on the incendiary to his deeds of darkness. I was surprised, sir, to hear the testimony of the learned judge from your county, [Judge WITHERELL.] He tells us he has had much experience in criminal jurisprudence; and that his experience is diverse from the experience of gentlemen upon this floor, and from the universal experience of all other legal gentlemen, so far as I have been able to learn it.

I, too, sir, have had some experience and some observation on this subject, and my experience and observation fully sustains that of others who have borne testimony, that more than three-fourths of all our pauperism and crime are the result of intemperance. After an examination in 1836 and 1837, made in the State of New York, it was made apparent that 400 out of 880 maniacs in the asylum, lost their reason through the use of intoxicating liquors; that 1700 out of 1900 paupers in the poor houses, that 1300 out of 1700 criminals in their prisons, owed their pauperism and crime to the same cause; that 43 out of 44 murders were committed under the influence of alcoholic liquors; that 67 out of 77 found dead, died of drunkenness; and that 400 out of 690 juvenile delinquents, either drank themselves or belonged to families that did so.

"I have shown," says the indefatigable Chipman, "I have shown beyond the power of contradiction, after visiting all the poor houses and prisons in the State, that more than three-fourths of all the pauperism is caused by intemperance; and that more than five-sixths of all those committed for crime are themselves intemperate. In no poor house have I failed to find the wife, the widow or the children of the drunkard." What an appalling picture—what an accumulation of wretchedness and misery, the result of this traffic.

The manufacturers and venders of alcohol in this nineteenth century are incurring a fearful responsibility, and are of all men most to be pitied. They are sporting upon the verge of a maelstrom which will prove their ruin. We have kindly reasoned with them—we have pointed them to the broken hearts and crushed hopes of their victims—we have besought them, by all that is dear in life and all their hopes of the future, to forbear; but they have bowed to mammon—they scorn our arguments and laugh at our entreaties—they cry "give, give," and are not satisfied until the last farthing is abstracted from the pocket of their victim, and he cast out upon the world a loathsome object, to wander a wretched vagabond, until he finds a drunkard's grave. Tell me not of moral suasion with liquor venders in this age of the world; the law, the law is the only agent that can reach their sympathies. Men who, for paltry pelf, reckless of consequences, with the broad light of Heaven crossing their pathway, still deal out the accursed poison in defiance of the Almighty; for it is written "woe unto him who giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth thy bottle to him and maketh him drunken: drink thou also and be drunken, and shameful spewing shall be upon thy glory." Ah, how often has this prophecy been verified? how many manufacturers and venders have become drunkards and followed their deluded victims to the drunkard's doom and the drunkard's hell? The lamented Judge Platt, formerly of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, well known to legal gentlemen upon this floor, once said that three-fourths of all the tavern keepers in that State for forty years previous had involved themselves and their families in ruin, and died drunkards. What an appalling picture! And who that has given this subject his attention will not fully endorse it? If you have not thought of it, gentlemen, look about you and inquire the fate of liquor dealers of your acquaintance for a given period, and give us the result. And have we no duty to perform to these men? De-luded and self-deceived, they are madly rushing on to ruin. And do you still urge moral suasion as the remedy. You might as well

"Stem the rapid stream with sand, Or fetter flame with flaxen band,"

As attempt to reason these men out of the traffic. The god of this world has blinded their eyes, and they pursue their object, though it be over the wreck of all human hopes.

At a meeting in the city of Boston some-time since, a reformed inebriate made the following statement: "I began to drink rum at twelve years of age. A rich man in this city (I do not name him) sold rum to me when I was not tall enough to reach the top of the counter. I had eleven companions, all healthy young men—all doing well in one business. We used to drink and gamble. We continued this course for some time; and now what is the history of us twelve? Six have died drunkards; two have enlisted in State ships; two are in the house of correction; one is a drunkard still; and I, I alone have escaped to tell you. Who was it?" exclaimed the young man, "who have for these many years sold us rum? Of them, in the sight of God, I demand those who have gone down to a drunkard's grave, or are living the drunkard's life. Where, where are my companions?" Here his voice was interrupted by convulsive sobbings. May not the family of the demented maniac and infuriated murderer demand their lost ones of the liquor vender? And will they not be held responsible in the sight of God for all the wretchedness and ruin—all the crime and blood caused by their unholy traffic? If we have no sympathy for our fellow men, are we ourselves safe? Are our sons and daughters safe from the exactions of this fell monster? May we not have cause ourselves to mourn over our apathy on this occasion, if we refuse to do our duty?

The delegate from Kent, sir, [Mr. CHURCH,] has told us the law is powerless to restrain this practice. That under the existing law of this State, prosecutions were commenced in his neighborhood—that he engaged for the defendants upon a good fee; and that the rum-sellers triumphed over the law—justice was defeated, and the law trampled upon. I cannot say, sir, as to the operation of the law in this State; but the law here I believe is a transcript of the law of New York; and in that State, while the law was in existence, we found no difficulty in enforcing the penalties. In the town in which I resided, the sale of alcohol has been for these many years prohibited, except in one or two cases, in which the officers entrusted with this matter proved faithless to their promises. After we had for a long time banished alcohol, a man from the adjoining county rented a tenement in our village, took possession of it, arranged tastefully his bottles, hung out his decoy light, and gave notice to the temperance men he would sell the "creature" in spite of them. A committee was appointed to wait upon him and inform him it was offensive to the community; and that unless he refrained from the violation of the law, we should call it to award and try its virtue. He laughed at us, and continued the traffic. A bailiff was soon dispatched to invite his attendance in a justice's court. On the day of trial he appeared with great pomp and parade, accompanied by counsel from the adjoining county, with a threat, (in the language of the delegate from St. Joseph,) to blow us sky-high. We were undismayed, proceeded quietly with the trial, and obtained judgment against him for the penalty; after which he appeared rather crest-fallen, but gave us notice he should appeal the cause. We assured him we should be happy to meet him, and should not at all object to a little additional cost from him. Time passed on, and just before the thirty days elapsed for the issuing of the execution, our landlord had a merry making at his house; the sound of the viol and the dance was heard; and when the company dispersed, our brave Pitcher, for that was his name, disappeared, bag and baggage. In the morning the house was found vacated, and we heard no more from Pitcher. He left his landlord minus his rent, and the town minus his society and the penalty, with which we were perfectly satisfied. Since that time no more difficulty has been experienced, and no more Pitchers have intruded upon them. In the town in which I now live, sir, no alcohol is sold, and I trust there never will be.

There was a time, Mr. President, when, looking at this subject, my heart has mis-given me and my courage has faltered—when I have thought upon the difficulties which encompass it, the influences to be overcome, the strong appetite, the incorrigible habits, the popular voice, I have trembled for my country. But as I look back for twenty years past, and remember our country as it then was—one unbroken phalanx in the broad road of intemperance; as I notice the progress which has been made, and count the trophies of the cause, I no longer doubt. Who so faithless as to doubt our success? Who, to-day, in this intelligent Convention, will refuse to give his influence in our behalf? Who refuse to cast his vote in favor of this cause? “Who will be a coward knave, let him turn and flee.”

The cause of temperance is a holy cause, and its progress is onward. I hope, I expect to see our State and the world purged from this plague spot, redeemed from this burning scourge. Let us, gentlemen of the Convention, be true to ourselves, true to our constituents, true to our country; let us adopt this provision in our organic law, and we shall do much to promote the interests, social, moral and political, of our country, and secure to ourselves the benedictions of the wise and the good.

Mr. DANFORTH moved the previous question.

Mr. WITHERELL—I trust the gentleman will withdraw the motion, to enable me to make a few remarks. I will detain the Convention only a few moments, and will renew the call for the previous question before taking my seat.

Mr. DANFORTH—If the gentleman will make a motion for the previous question before taking his seat, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. W. agreed to make the motion, and Mr. D. withdrew his motion.

Mr. WITHERELL said he was a temperance man, only he was not in favor of the proposition before the Convention. What he had said his experience was in regard to the connection existing between intemperance and crime, he renewed. He could not give his consent to the proposition under consideration, although he claimed to be a good temperance man, and desired to prosper the cause as much as possible. He renewed the motion for the previous question.

At the request of Mr. MASON the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. MASON desired to offer a few observations in relation to the position assumed by the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN.] The gentleman told us that the friends of temperance had misrepresented the efficacy of the license laws. So far as his [Mr. M's] experience went, the license laws, as they existed at present, had been deemed odious, both by the friends and the enemies of intemperance. He knew from his experience that the friends of temperance had disapproved of them. For, when a vote came to be taken in a township, and the vote was in favor of licences, the authorities were forced to put the law into operation, and thus the sale of liquor obtains a respectability. Gentlemen had talked about that subject understandingly. No one pretended to say that if there were no license law, every one would be permitted to sell liquors. That was the experiment which he desired to try; he desired to see whether public opinion would correct this evil or not.

He wished to ask the gentleman from Wayne, [Mr. WITHERELL,] if a crime—such as perjury—had not been in some instances connected with intemperance? He wished to know where the main absorbing question was license or no license—where political parties had been broken up by means of this question, as in his own county, where there was a democratic majority of 150, and yet elected a whig supervisor, by reason of this question—he wished to know if the gentleman had not seen persons going up to the polls dressed as citizens, and vote in favor of licenses, although they had no right to record any vote? He had seen such persons go up to the ballot box, and by their illegal votes put this odious system upon the people.

This provision did not prevent the Convention from submitting the question as to whether the Legislature should prohibit the sale of ardent spirits, or not. For his part, he would be very glad to submit the question to the people.

The gentleman from Kalamazoo [Mr. WELLS] inquired how would it be if the Legislature should refuse to repeal the license law? Why, in regard to that, it was mere'y necessary to say that all laws must be consistent with the provisions of this constitution. But it was not to be supposed, however, that the Legislature would not act in obedience to the constitution. But, if it did not, it would be no worse than the sale was now. At any rate, the Legislature would be empowered to prohibit it at all times. They were not stopped by this provision from regulating and providing pains or penalties, or excise on the sale of liquor, if in their wisdom they should see necessary. We left them at liberty to suppress it at all times; but we said they should not sanction it by public authority. They should not make it respectable by such countenance. He took it that, according to the proposition, "people of respectability and good moral character," applied equally to all. He did not know by what mode we could decide as to the respectability of a man, in view of the proposition; whether by the size of his house or by the quality of his liquors.—(Laughter.) The calling was equally honorable to the man who kept a four storied house or a petty groggery. It was equal in principle. He hoped, then, seeing that the retention of the amendment of the committee would not interfere with the submission of any proposition to the people on this subject, that the Legislature shall not place the impress of public sanction upon this traffic.

Mr. MOORE would occupy only a moment of the time of the Convention. There was one important principle that had not been touched upon; which was, that the license laws granted exclusive privileges to a certain class of men. This was contrary to democratic principles, from banking down to the most petty questions. Nothing should be countenanced that gave exclusive privileges to any class. He hoped it would be left to the Legislature to adopt such a course in regard to the matter as in their wisdom might seem best.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE expressed his concurrence in the remarks of the gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. MASON.] He was opposed in toto to granting exclusive privileges to any one class. He had simply to say in regard to this question, that he thought that the proposition together with the amendments which had been presented would be sufficient. With that view he would vote against the amendment of the committee of the whole, striking out, and would vote for the amendment to the proposition, and for the proposition when so amended.

Mr. WOODMAN observed that so far as he understood the wishes of his constituents, they were decidedly against the Legislature sanctioning the sale of ardent spirits.

Mr. HANSCOM hoped that his colleague [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH] would withdraw his proposition. He would support the proposition as originally proposed by the committee. So far as his observation went, he was of opinion that it met the tone of public sentiment in his portion of the State. But we should recollect that the constitution we were about to submit to the people was a dead letter until the citizens of this State had breathed into it the breath of life. And he thought we had done enough already to endanger the success of the instrument before the people, without going any further. It occurred to him that if we put such a stringent provision as this in the constitution, it, together with other matters, would go far to endanger the entire fabric. If his colleague would withdraw his proposition and let us come at a direct vote on the concurrence or non-concurrence with the committee, we would arrive at the best conclusion in relation to this subject. And if the select committee on the subject say that the sale of liquor should be prohibited by the Legislature or not, he would concur in their conclusion.

If this article were to be sold at all, why not leave its sale open to all? But if it be a fact that a man paid into the treasury a certain amount for the liberty to destroy his fellow men, why then inhibit it altogether. Cut loose the treasury from the receipt of moneys that were coined by the tears and blood of the widows and orphans of the State. Was it right that our government should receive support from such a source? If it were not right, then do away with the entire receipt of revenue from this source.

He would support the provision originally reported, with the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Calhoun. He would adopt this course in order that the result of their labors should not be endangered before the people.

Mr. COMSTOCK said, as I shall be called upon to give my vote upon the section under consideration, I wish to give my reasons for the same. I am a friend to the cause of temperance, and for the very reason offered by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM.] I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH,] and also to the section proposed to be inserted, for the reason that it will endanger the ratification of the constitution by the people. And further, you have a special committee appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the whole subject, and who are expected to report an article to meet the case, to be submitted for the distinct action of the people. This can then be done with safety, and without endangering the whole fabric of the constitution. I shall, therefore, for these reasons, vote against the amendment and section proposed to be reinstated. And I would further add, that I do not think the section proposed to be introduced will aid the cause of temperance, but have a tendency to give license to a wholesale traffic, without stint or limit.

Mr. FRALICK said, as he had been requested, he would make a short statement in regard to his section of the country. Eight or ten years ago there were some twenty places at which liquor was sold in the town. It was a notorious drinking place; but since the license laws went into operation they had effectually stopped the sale of liquor. He had the honor of being supervisor of that town when five cases were prosecuted successfully against liquor venders. One paid the fine, and the others stopped the sale entirely. Last spring, when 600 votes were polled, only thirteen were given for "license."

Mr. MOORE here stated that he had just received a petition in regard to the traffic in ardent spirits, which he would be glad to have read, as the question would probably be soon disposed of.

The petition was sent up to the Secretary and read by him.

Mr. CORNELL was opposed to the amendment presented by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH,]

He was in favor of the provision reported by the committee, except the last clause; and that, gentlemen had proposed to strike out hereafter. To that he was opposed, because it would leave open the door wide, to evade the law. And he would here say, that he was opposed to our present license laws, because they were a dead letter on our statute book. He was opposed to them because not only his constituents, but the people at large, disapproved of the present laws. Their opinion, so far as he understood it, went to this point: that the Legislature should not have the power to grant licenses. But there was another reason to be taken into consideration—the license laws, if they did not favor a corporation and exclusive privileges, yet built up a sort of corporation. It was true there were different interests involved, but liquor dealers had but one object and aim in view.

Now, in regard to the selection of respectable men of moral character to whom was to be committed the sale of liquors, what effect had it on these very men? Statistics showed us, from every section of the country, that one-half or two-thirds of these men engaged in the sale of ardent spirits, became almost confirmed drunkards, entailing every misery on their families. Should we have a law that would break down the best part of our community? Should we recognize a law such as would break them down physically and morally? It was granted on all hands that this traffic was an evil; and why, then, select those men—good men—to carry it into operation? There were other details with which he was quite familiar, but which it was not necessary he should enter into now. He, like the gentleman from Berrien, was a temperance man, and he was a temperance man before there was a temperance society in the State. He thought he had gone a little farther than the gentleman had, for he said he did not belong to the Daughters of Temperance—he [Mr. C.] did. (Laughter.)

The question being upon striking out and inserting, and a division of the question being demanded, the motion to strike out prevailed.

The question then recurred on inserting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH,] on which question Mr. VAN V. demanded the yeas and nays, and the same were ordered. At the suggestion, however, of Messrs. PIERCE and CORNELL, the amendment was understood to be withdrawn.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend by adding to the section the words "and this section shall be submitted to the people as a separate question."

Mr. S. CLARK—Does the amendment of the gentleman from Berrien [Mr. BRITAIN] apply to the section, or to the amendment of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH?]

The PRESIDENT replied that the chair understood the latter amendment to have been withdrawn.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—No sir; the call for the yeas and nays was withdrawn, but I did not withdraw the amendment.

Several members—We understood the amendment to have been withdrawn.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I requested the yeas and nays to be taken on my amendment, and the gentleman from Calhoun [Mr. J. D. PIERCE] then asked me to withdraw that call, which I did.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—It was the amendment that I asked to be withdrawn.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH—I did not so understand it.

Mr. CORNELL—I asked the gentleman to withdraw the amendment. Perhaps the gentleman misunderstood me.

The PRESIDENT remarked that the chair, like other members of the Convention, understood the gentleman to have withdrawn the amendment.

After some further cursory remarks, the question pending was decided to be upon Mr. BRITAIN's amendment; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Butterfield, Carr, Choate, Cook, Fralick, Green, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, M. Robinson, Storey, Town, Walker, Webster, Wells, Willard, Witherell—26.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Bush, Chandler, Church, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, Orr, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Prevost, E. S. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sutherland, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, White, Whipple, Whitemore, Williams, Woodman, President—64.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH then renewed his proposition, and the yeas and nays being had on the same, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. Bartow, Butterfield, Fralick, Gardiner, Lovell, Mowry, Roberts, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Sturgis, Van Valkenburgh, Wells, President—13.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Bush, Carr, Chandler, Choate, Church, S. Clark, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Morrison, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Soule, Storey, Sullivan, Sutherland, Tiffany, Town, Walker, Webster, White, Whipple, Whitemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—70.

The question then being on concurring with the committee of the whole in striking out the section, (39th,) the yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Arzeno, Axford, Beeson, Britain, Ammon Brown, Chapel, Choate, Church, Cook, Danforth, Desnoyers, Hathaway, McClelland, Mosher, Redfield, Roberts, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Rix Robinson, Storey, Tiffany, Town, Walker, Witherell, President—27.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Backus, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beardsley, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Daniels, Dimond, Eastman, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gardiner, Gibson, Graham, Green, Hanscom, Hart, Harvey, Hascall, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lee, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McLeod, Moore, Morrison, Mowry, Newberry, O'Brien, J. D. Pierce, N. Pierce, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sullivan, Sutherland, Van Valkenburgh, Warden, Webster, Wells, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—65.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAND, the second section of the article was amended by striking out in the last line the word "four," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two."

The proposition made by the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] relative to the recommittal of the article on the Legislative Department, with instructions, (which had by consent been passed over,) was then taken under consideration.

A division of the question being called for, the same turned on recommitting.

Mr. HANSCOM said it was due, perhaps, to the Convention, that he should explain the reasons which induced him to propose the recommittal of this article, with instructions. He thought, in the first place, that it would save the time of the Convention to recommit, rather than that he should propose the various amendments which he thought necessary to be made, in the progress of our business. The Convention of course might decide against recommitting, and thus cut the entire matter off.

He thought the number of Senators contemplated by the article reported as too large. He had stated in the first instance that he thought the number of Senators and Representatives provided for by this article, was unnecessarily large. Eighty members of the Legislature of this State, in the popular branch, were, in his judgment, as many as the exigencies of this State would require for the next twenty years, or fifty years, or perhaps ever require. And, by electing this number, a principle of economy—which he did not regard of very great importance—was to some extent consulted. Taking into consideration the other changes proposed to be made, there would be a saving of about one-sixth.

The same objection applied to the Senate as to the House of Representatives. So far as his experience of the Legislatures of other States extended, he found that the business of those bodies was committed to the hands of but a few members. Take, for instance, the State of Massachusetts, which had an immense representation in the popular branch of the Legislature. Any man who had sat there for a day must have seen that a vast amount of the business was transacted by committees. So that it was easily perceived that with convenience the amount of representation might be cut down to one-half or one-fourth of the present amount.

He proposed to amend the third section by striking out the provision; as it now stood it was vague and uncertain. As he took the provision, it read, "every organized county containing 2,000 inhabitants, shall be entitled to one Representative." An uncertainty might take place as to a county organization. In effect, this: whether the organization was one merely on paper, or effected by the election of county officers. His object was to place it beyond all uncertainty in regard to the organization of counties, to be entitled to a Representative at the election in 1851. He proposed also to leave open to the people of coming time the mode and manner of electing their Senators, &c. [Indistinctly heard.] The public sentiment of this State had always looked upon the single senatorial measure as an evil. He, for one, was unwilling to tie up the hands of the people of the State, and give the Legislature the power to impose a system which as yet had not been imposed on this people, and one which had not been thoroughly experienced. If, as gentlemen said, the public sentiment demanded this change, the action of the legislature no doubt would be found corresponding with that sentiment. The people would elect their Representatives in reference to that subject; and would instruct them in relation to it, until they acted in accordance with their wishes. Again: he was opposed to small districts for Senatorial purposes. It occurred to him that counties should elect by districts, and not have them cut up into small parts for election purposes. It was for that reason he proposed to introduce that provision, so that the people in Oakland might go to the polls and elect on a general ticket for that number of Senators that the Legislature might choose to give them.

In section fifteen he proposed to strike out the words "three-fourths," and insert instead, "a majority," for the reasons which he had given in committee. A reasonable negative, or rather a limited veto, he approved of; but this was an almost absolute prohibition; it placed the executive department of the government over the legislative.

Then, in the 20th section he proposed to strike out at the end of the section the words "and for one year thereafter." That question had been very fully discussed in committee. But he would here say, that the office of Representative in the Legislature was not going to be a very grave, or a very important one, under the provision we were now establishing. He thought it was a perfectly useless one. It was one that completely disfranchised men of their rights as citizens, for one year after their term of office as a legislator had expired; and it was a provision that would operate as a bar against obtaining the services of such men as we required in our legislative bodies.

In the 23d section, strike out the words "all the members elected to."

In the 25th section he proposed to strike out all that portion of it which had reference to the details of printing, and which undertook to impose terms upon those engaging in the public printing of the State. It appeared to him to be very questionable to run into matters of this kind. As was remarked by the gentleman from Washtenaw, [Mr. GARDINER,] he thought the insertion of such a provision would endanger the "craft." Notwithstanding all that had been said against them, he respected them very much as a class. The printer had ever been held as a most important and useful member of the community, by reason of the nature of his labors. Then, would we undertake to send forth to the world that our craft in Michigan, and our Legislature, are so knavish that we must tie them down by this provision? Why not fix the contract in relation to the binding of your laws, as to provide for printing them? There was just as much propriety in the one as in the other. Such a provision would work badly, and would operate oppressively in practice. He felt that the good sense of this Convention, when they looked at the matter, would see the obvious propriety of not placing it here.

The 38th section read: "No appropriation of the public money shall be made for the publication of the laws of this State in any newspaper." He proposed to strike out that section. He conceived that it was very expedient that the laws should be published in some newspapers having a large circulation: for instance, in the Detroit papers. He used the word Detroit, because it was now the commercial metropolis of the State; and the papers of that city had a larger circulation than papers in other parts of the State. At least, for years to come they would have the most extended circulation. He would also propose to publish the laws in the paper published at the seat of government, as it was supposed it would be exchanged with all the other papers in the State. But it might be said, and was said, that the people would not read those papers. We could not help that; it was their own fault if they did not. We provided a cheap means for the people to obtain useful knowledge in relation to the laws; and if they did not avail themselves of it, it was to their own injury. These were his general views in relation to this article. He did not intend to occupy any time, more than to make an explanation. He hoped the article would be re-committed, and that some, if not all of the amendments which he suggested, would be made.

Mr. McCLELLAND—I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Oakland, [Mr. HANSCOM,] to recommit this article with the instructions he suggests. There are some of its features I do not approve, but after the full discussion that has been had on all the objectionable portions, I am content to submit. In many of the remarks of the gentleman I concur; but it is too late to refer the subject; and if we did, it is very doubtful whether it could be put in better shape. His suggestion as to the number of members of the House and Senate is similar to the provision in the old constitution, and not so definite or satisfactory as the one in the article under consideration.

The question as to single senatorial districts is well understood, and the minds of members are fixed and settled, and no change can be anticipated. I co-operated with the gentleman in his opposition to this; but we have been thoroughly thrashed; and in such case it is the part of wisdom to yield with as good grace as possible. I agreed with him, that a county should not be divided in the formation of districts, in connection with the single senatorial district question, but we were overruled by the majority, and I, for one, object no further.

The gentleman says that the veto of the Governor is to be controlled by two-thirds of the members elected, and therefore takes exception to this provision. This question has been agitated for many years, and the people are perfectly conversant with it, and with a unanimity almost unparalleled, it has been decided that it should remain as it is.

Mr. HANSCOM, (interposing,) inquired in what State it was required that there should be a vote of two-thirds of the members elected, to overrule an executive veto?

Mr. McCLELLAND—The word employed in the original section was "present;" but it was stricken out, and the Convention inserted in lieu thereof, the word "elected." This is preferable to adopting the suggestion of the gentleman, and permitting a "mere majority" to override a veto.

The 20th section, I think, is misunderstood by the gentleman. If he will turn to it, he will find that he has misconstrued it. The words "one year thereafter," relate only to the last clause of the section, reading thus: "Nor shall any member of the Legislature be interested, either directly or indirectly, in any contract with the State, or any county thereof, authorized by any law passed during the time for which he shall have been elected, and for one year thereafter." If the language be not sufficiently plain and distinct, it can be changed so as more strongly to express the idea intended; but the object to be accomplished should not be abandoned. It is proper that a Representative should be prohibited from being interested or participating in any contract, under a law which was passed by the Legislature of which he was a member, during his term, and for a year thereafter, so that his action may be entirely disinterested.

In the 23d section, he proposes to strike out the words "all the members elected to." The committee intended to make that provision as strong as practicable, so as to prevent the mischief that had resulted from the practice of having important general laws take effect from and after their passage. Instances of this kind are not wanting in this State, and I gave illustrations before of the evils resulting from it. Under the operation of the present constitution, and the rules of the two houses, it is an easy matter to put in the clause that is usually engrafted upon such bills—"that this act shall take effect from and after its passage,"—unnoticed by the members. We considered it right and useful thus to call the attention of members to it, so that if an act was passed containing such clause, they could not say "we were not aware of it and had no notice of it."

In relation to that portion of the 25th section which owes its paternity to the gentleman from Kalamazoo, [Mr. HASCALL,] as far as I understand it, I am well pleased with it. Yet, I confess I do not understand the whole sufficiently to vote for engrafting it upon the constitution. A motion to reconsider this is in order, and if reconsidered, and a motion made to strike it out, I will go with the gentleman. It is a project worthy the consideration of the Legislature, and the experiment might there be safely tested, as it appears to have much virtue in it. Although it strikes me favorably, yet, as I remarked on another occasion, I am opposed to inserting anything in the fundamental law which has not been fully tried.

As to the 38th section, my votes yesterday showed my concurrence with the gentleman. I looked upon the provision as unwise and impolitic, and calculated to involve us in difficulty and embarrassment; but the Convention thought differently, and as in the other cases, I bow to their decision.

And now, sir, as the gentleman and myself have in most cases so cordially co-operated with each other, and have contended so fiercely for every inch we have lost, let us rest content, and take our defeat as philosophically as possible.

The question being on recommitting, (a division of the question having been previously called for,) the same was put, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alvord, Beardsley, Crarry, Church, Crouse, Eastman, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, McLeod, J. D. Pierce, Roberts, Rix Robinson, Storey, Sturgis, Sutherland, White, Whipple, President—21.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Adams, Anderson, Arzeno, Axford, Backus, Barnard, H. Bartow, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Carr, Chandler, Chapel, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Desnoyers, Dimond, Eaton, Edmunds, Fralick, Gale, Gibson, Graham, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, Moore, Morrison, Mosher, Mowry, Newberry, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sullivan, Tiffany, Town, Van Valkenburgh, Walker, Warden, Webster, Wells, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman—68.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the vote by which the Convention concurred in the amendment made in committee to section 3, be reconsidered.

Mr. S. stated that his object was to reduce to a certainty, what was left open to doubtful construction. The action of the Convention had been favorable to the new counties, and he only wished to have the proper construction placed on the section, in regard to the organization of counties. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oakland [Mr. HANSCOM] would remedy the doubt. Two counties in his portion of the State would elect their county officers in November, and they would enter on their official duties in 1851, and he wished them to have a Representative, beyond any doubt.

Mr. SULLIVAN inquired how many counties there were thus organized. He understood there were several, and the effect would be to give some six or eight members to counties at present unorganized.

Mr. MASON hoped the motion to reconsider would not prevail. He thought the gentleman from Saginaw [Mr. SUTHERLAND] could attain his object by a motion to amend. There were four counties in the upper peninsula with a paper organization, and the effect would be—

At this point Mr. ROBERTS raised a point of order, that the gentleman from St. Clair [Mr. MASON] asserts an untruth in stating that there is no organized county in the upper peninsula.

The PRESIDENT decided Mr. MASON in order.

Mr. MASON resuming, asked if it were the intention of gentlemen to admit four representatives from the upper peninsula, from counties having only a paper organization?

Mr. M. read an amendment which he said he considered proper and just to the new counties, and by which the Convention would know how far they were extending representation. (This amendment of Mr. M. was not obtained by the Rep.)

Mr. ROBERTS remarked that there was abundant evidence on record in the office of the Secretary of State, as any member could see if they took the trouble to examine, contradicting the gentleman in direct terms. There was evidence on record showing that four other counties were organized. A law was passed in 1848, by which these counties were organized, and judicial districts established, judges appointed, and all the county officers elected; and had since been re-elected, last November, for a term of two years. He made this explanation to show that the gentleman [Mr. MASON] was entirely mistaken.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said, when he introduced his motion, it was not his object to get up a discussion. From the vote taken the other day, great liberality had been shown to the new counties, and he supposed there would be no objection to his motion, with a view of putting the matter beyond doubt. He withdrew the motion.

Mr. LOVELL moved to amend section three by adding thereto, "and that each county having said ratio, and a fraction over, equal to a moiety of said ratio, shall be entitled to two Representatives; and so on above that number, giving one additional member for each additional ratio."

Mr. L. said, as the section then stood, the Legislature could give the counties having the ratio and a moiety over, an additional member or not, as they thought proper. His amendment enjoined it on the Legislature to give it to them, and he considered it but proper to the new counties. It also applied to the old counties. He was happy to say it embodied the practice of the Legislature for the last fifteen years. It was not his own language, but was taken from the constitution of Missouri.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MASON offered the following amendment to section 3: "The counties of Newaygo, Tuscola and Midland shall be entitled each to one Representative."

Mr. M. said he supposed when this provision was passed, it was thought, perhaps, that this article would give these counties each a Representative. He understood, however, that they had not perfected their county government, and hence would not be entitled to a Representative under the law as it at present stood. He hoped, then, that the amendment would be adopted, so that each of those counties might be represented.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE moved that the Convention adjourn, but at the suggestion of Mr. McCLELLAND, withdrew the motion.

Mr. COOK demanded the previous question, but gave way to

The PRESIDENT, who stated the question to be upon the motion of the gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. MASON.]

Mr. WILLIAMS then took the floor and was proceeding with some remarks, when he was interrupted by

Mr. COOK, who observed that he had called for the previous question, but gave way to the President, in order that the question might be stated.

The PRESIDENT remarked that after the statement of the question, the gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] first caught the eye of the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that the spirit now manifested shewed him that he ought to say that which he was going to say. When speaking on this matter, he had expressed the most extreme liberality, and was the last man on whom the gag should be put. He would say that the spirit here manifested reminded him of the course which he used to see adopted towards children—"shut your eyes, open your mouth, and swallow the dose." There was great ambiguity in the language of the section in relation to representation of this upper peninsula country, and in this intelligent body very different opinions were held in regard to it.

The act of 1848, relative to the organization of the counties of Marquette, Schoolcraft, Houghton and Ontonagon, was so recorded that some members of this Convention declared they would be entitled to four members under the article as it stands. Others put the construction that they were one county and would have one Representative. It appeared to him their duty to render clear, explicit and definite what they did intend. Was this Convention willing to stultify themselves, so that when they went home and might be asked how many Representatives were given to a certain locality, they could not explain what the language of this section meant? They ought to use explicit language, in order that the treasury might not be robbed and our people deprived of their relative and just rights. He did not desire them to leave this matter in ambiguity. He would propose therefore to insert the following:

"The counties of Sanilac and Huron shall be entitled to one Representative; the county of Tuscola shall be entitled to one Representative; the counties of Saginaw, Midland, and territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative; the counties of Montcalm, Gratiot, and the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative; the counties of Newaygo, Oceana, and the territory thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative; and the counties of Houghton, Marquette, Schoolcraft and Ontonagon shall be entitled to one Representative."

He had embraced the four counties for one Representative, because nothing had been shown to prove they were entitled to any. Look at the act of 1848, organizing them, and in that act only three places were designated as suitable places for holding the polls—Eagle River, Copper Harbor and L'Ance; and a gentleman had stated on this floor that from all the evidence existing in the Secretary of State's office, there were but 237 votes given in all those counties for Delegates to this Convention—about equal to two-thirds of the number of voters in the town in which he resided.

One Representative, therefore, he deemed liberal.

To this question he had given much consideration, and the upper country members should not attribute to him any unkindness; for on one occasion he had spent almost weeks as one of a sub-committee of the Chicago Convention of 1847, in obtaining information to be laid before Congress, to induce liberal appropriations to aid in the development of the resources of the upper peninsula, and obtain that ample protection from the general government which it deserved; for he could well appreciate the vast and future importance of all its interests and its wealth, whether in mines of copper and iron, or the lumber trade, or its boundless fisheries. Therefore, gentlemen would give him credit for not regarding unkindly the interests of the upper peninsula, which would ultimately be immense.

A member—What do you do with the county of Delta?

Mr. WILLIAMS replied that that county could be easily comprehended in his proposition, for it might embrace Schoolcraft and Ontonagon, and the territory thereto attached. As he had said before, he had given to this question much consideration, and he could not find that in the whole of those counties there were ten thousand people. He would say that there was no evidence which could be obtained to show that in all those counties named in his amendment in both peninsulas, and in Chippewa and Mackinac besides, there were as many votes cast as there were in the county of Eaton at the last election; yet the most favorable construction of the section, as it stands, to the upper counties, would result in this: that about ten thousand people would get eight Representatives. Now, if the minimum was adopted, as the whole number of the House of Representatives, here would be one forty-fifth of the people represented by one-eighth of the House. This was a concession too large, and uncalled for on any consideration of justice. He would offer, then, what he had read, as an amendment to the amendment.

A member—what does the gentleman mean by "sub-committee?"

Mr. WILLIAMS—I mean a committee of the Chicago convention.

Mr. ROBERTS—(inaudibly heard)—thanked the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] for the kindness he had manifested towards the upper country. He would venture to say that those upper counties had never been the cause of one sixpence of expense to the State, unless we took into consideration the pay of a member in the Legislature last winter. He alluded to the Representative from Chippewa. They had paid into the treasury hundreds of dollars on the one per cent tax; yet there had not been an expense on the part of the State, in regard to the new counties, for a solitary object; not even to the laying out of a bridle path. The county of Houghton (observed Mr. R.) contained 1,000 miners, over 21 years of age, amongst its population, and not two hundred women. But he would not speak of the mines of wealth abounding in the copper or iron districts of that region; or of the fisheries, being probably superior to those of New Foundland. However, he would ask the gentleman to omit the counties of Schoolcraft and Houghton in his motion. Let the gentleman wait for the report of the committee in relation to this upper country, and then he could decide whether we asked for any thing which was improper or not.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.

The Convention was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

The consideration of the article entitled "Legislative Department," was resumed.

The question being upon the substitute proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph [Mr. WILLIAMS] for the amendment presented by the gentleman from St. Clair, [Mr. MASON,] the former was modified so as to read as follows, and was accepted by Mr. MASON:

"And provided that the county of Huron shall be attached to Sanilac, and together they shall be entitled to one Representative; the county of Tuscola shall be entitled to one Representative; the county of Gratiot, Midland and Saranac shall be entitled to one Representative; the county of Montcalm, and the counties thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representa-tative; the counties of Newaygo, Oceana, and the counties thereto attached, shall be entitled to one Representative; the counties of Houghton, Schoolcraft, Marquette, and Ontonagon, shall be entitled to one Representative; and the county of Delta shall be attached to Mackinac, and together they shall be entitled to one Representative."

Mr. McCLELLAND—Is it in order to move to strike out the entire section and propose a substitute?

The PRESIDENT—It would be in order after this amendment has been disposed of.

[A rather lengthy conversational discussion then took place, as to whether at this stage a substitute was in order, as proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND;] and the President deciding it not in order, Mr. McC. appealed from the decision of the chair; but after some remarks by members, withdrew the appeal.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend the substitute of the gentleman from St. Joseph, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] by striking out that part of it which relates to the counties of "Marquette, Schoolcraft, Houghton, Ontonagon, Delta and Mackinac."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment as amended, and was lost.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered the following as a substitute for the section (3d):

"The Legislature shall provide by law for an enumeration of the inhabitants of this State in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-five, and at the end of every ten years thereafter; and at the first session after each enumeration so made, and also after each enumeration made by the authority of the United States, the Legislature shall apportion anew the Representatives and Senators among the several counties and districts, according to the number of white inhabitants; which apportionment shall remain unaltered until the return of another enumeration. Every organized county, which, with the territory that may be attached thereto for representative purposes, shall contain 2,000 inhabitants, shall be entitled to one Representative; and it shall be competent for the Legislature to authorize an enumeration of the inhabitants of such county or territory, in such manner and at such time as they may deem fit."

Mr. McLEOD proposed to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "white inhabitants," the following: "and civilized persons of Indian descent, not members of any tribe." There was a class of persons (said Mr. McL.) who had given rise to a good deal of discussion, as to their relative rights, at almost every meeting of our boards of inspectors. He had proposed to have made this amendment when the article on the Elective Franchise came up; but he now found it necessary to present it here. The persons to whom this amendment had reference were civilized people—white to all intents and purposes, except they had descent from Indian parents. In the northern part of the State there had been much of intermarriage between the French and the Indian races; and consequently there sprung up amongst us a mixed race, in regard to which, they had a great deal of difficulty at election times. One board of inspectors would decide that these persons were not white; another, for political purposes, maintained that they were, and admitted them to vote. There were many of this class at present occupying situations of trust and honor. Some of them were justices of the peace, and judges, &c. He would remark that in Wisconsin they had adopted the plan which he proposed in the amendment he had presented, in relation to persons of Indian descent. He was certain, then, that it was not the intention of this Convention to disfranchise that class in our community to which he had alluded.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND proposed further to amend, by adding the following: "Provided, that Tuscola shall be entitled to one Representative; Midland, Gratiot and Saranac one Representative; Newaygo and Oceana one Representative; Sanilac one Representative."

Mr. S. said, this amendment ought to be adopted, inasmuch as the citizens of the counties therein mentioned would be deprived of their Representatives unless it be carried. And he hoped the Convention would indulge him with the yeas and nays on this amendment. He trusted that all actuated by a liberality of feeling, would record their votes in its favor. But if it be lost, he would not consider that all was lost. However, he would consider it as an expression of opinion on the part of this Convention, that those counties were not worthy of a Representative; though from the development which had been made of the resources of that section of the country, and the increase which had taken place in the number of its inhabitants, it was evident they were justly entitled to representation.

There was another county which had not been noticed by any gentleman on this floor. It was the county of Arrenac on Saginaw bay, joining Midland on the north. It now contained, undoubtedly, 500 inhabitants, and the most valuable fisheries in the State. There were over $50,000 worth of fish taken off that coast every year. If there was a feeling in favor of extending this right of representation to the northern counties, the Convention ought certainly to extend it to that county.

At the suggestion of Mr. LOVELL, the county of Montcalm was added to Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment.

The question on the adoption of the amendment then being put, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Bagg, Barnard, H. Bartow, Burns, Bush, Chandler, Chapel, Church, J. Clark, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Dimond, Eastman, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Hixon, Lovell, Mason, McLeod, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Rix Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Sturgis, Sutherland, Town, Walker, Warden, White, Whipple, President—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Axford, Backus, Beardsley, Beeson, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Ammon Brown, Asahel Brown, Butterfield, Carr, Choate, S. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Kinne, Marvin, McClelland, Moore, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, N. Pierce, Redfield, Robertson, E. S. Robinson, Story, Sullivan, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Wells, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Witherell, Woodman—47.

Mr. CHAPEL moved to strike out

"2,000," and insert in lieu thereof "1,500," which was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITE proposed the following as an addition to the substitute: "Provided that each county whose organization on the first day of January, A. D. 1851, shall have been perfected by election of county officers, shall be entitled to at least one Representative."

Mr. W. hoped that the Convention would not shut out from representation in the Legislature any county which had organized, or taken steps towards organization, under the act passed last winter. He believed it to be right that those holding property in these counties should have this right extended to them. In his opinion, the older counties ought not to object to the extension of representation to the new counties. If the Legislature had seen fit to establish the political organization of any territory, then taking property and population as the basis of representation, he conceived that such organization ought to be represented in the popular branch of the Legislature. He hoped, then, that the Convention would extend that right liberally to our new counties.

Mr. BACKUS did not perceive with what propriety gentlemen had argued in favor of giving Representatives to those new counties, while they admitted the entire disparity, both as to persons and property, between those counties and the older ones. He would say, without hesitation or the fear of contradiction, it was unjust, because it was unequal. Equality was justice. He was gratified to see the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] and concurred with him heartily in extending the utmost liberality. In truth, he was surprised to see gentlemen asking for more. If the basis of representation in the Legislature was to be fixed at 6,000 or 7,000, he would ask what more could gentlemen demand? These new counties, by the substitute about to be voted upon, were to have one to four in the representation of the State. Could anything more be asked upon a principle of the most enlarged liberality? Gentlemen talked about property and persons; but he would venture to say that by no mathematical rule could we come to a conclusion more consistent with justice than the substitute now under consideration. He, for one, could not see any valid reason why 500 people, or any number less than the quota, going into the wilderness to reside, should be entitled to a Representative, while those living in other parts of the State were required to have 7,000 to entitle them to a representation in the Legislature. However, by some magical process, 500 persons in a county, when north of a certain line, had as much to do with guarding the interests of the State as 7,000 living in a southern county! If gentleman speak of property as the basis of representation, why, then, place the basis upon property.

The reason why he liked the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND,] was simply because it was definite. The people would know that 2,000 persons north of Saginaw bay, in every relation concerning public matters, would count the same as 7,000 here. Could any more liberal concession be made? It was really pushing the thing too far. It was argued with some earnestness that unless some provision of this kind were adopted, the people in those new counties would be excluded from representation until 1859, although their population came up to the ratio. It did involve a speculative hardship; but to those counties only which had existence but upon the face of the map. No matter how small their population might be now, and for years, they were to be admitted to the same amount of representation as those living in the densely populated counties of the State. It was entirely too much.

Mr. LOVELL said no doubt the gentleman who last spoke could see through the whole business as clear as mud. (Laughter.) The gentleman said "equality was justice." It was—no one denied the proposition—he did not, so far as it was applicable to this case. The reasoning of the gentleman amounted to this: "if 6,000 were the ratio of representation, it was just that the new counties should have the same population in order to be entitled to a Representative." Well, if it were "justice," let the gentleman bring up a proposition of that kind, and see if this Convention will adopt it. He said "he was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, because it was definite." It was especially definite! Well, he [Mr.

L.] had not a very weighty intellect or much of imagination; but he understood the gentleman's proposition, and he, for one, disapproved of it. But was it any more definite than the proposition he had introduced?

The gentleman spoke of a ratio of eight thousand. In his opinion, it was not going to be any such ratio; it was not, he thought, going to be over six thousand. The gentleman also alluded to "the sensitiveness of members." So far as he was acquainted with human nature, he would say for himself, that when he felt strong upon any subject, he did not feel sensitive at all. The north was in the power of the members of this Convention. He acknowledged that property and population were the true basis of representation. But there was no general rule that had not an exception, except, perhaps, a few in mathematics. Then he would submit if this were not a case in which the Convention should depart from the principle of property and population as the basis of representation? The Convention of 1835 departed from it; and nearly every State in the Union, under like circumstances, had departed from this rule.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] be adopted, what would be the situation of things? This bill would have to be fought over again; we would have to fight for Chippewa and Mackinac, or leave them without a Representative. Probably the county of Sanilac would be entitled to what the gentleman proposed; but Chippewa and Mackinac would be cut out; Montcalm with her 300 voters at the present day, would have no Representative; as also Newaygo. He thought Tuscola and Midland were organized; he knew that Midland was. However, gentlemen did not like his proposition. He supposed they did not like it on account of the "ticklish" position in which Midland and Tuscola were situated. He hoped the substitute of the gentleman from Monroe would not be sustained; for, as he had previously remarked, not only would Mackinac and Chippewa be deprived of a Representative, but so also would Tuscola and Montcalm. The present census, now being taken, would show that Sanilac had 2,000 inhabitants; Montcalm, he was told, had 200 voters, but had not a population of 2,000; so she would not have a Representative until the next census was taken. But gentlemen would say it was easy to take a census; but who was to bear the expense of taking a census—the State? No—the poor county; and then it would have a Representative. This amendment was more uncertain, and left the whole matter more unsettled, at least in his opinion, than the amendment which had been already adopted.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Lapeer by adding the following: “And such territory as may be attached thereto for representative purposes,” to come in after “officers.”

The amendment was accepted.

Mr. BACKUS observed that the comments of the gentleman from Ionia [Mr. LOVELL] had failed to convert him to the notion that there was in the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe more of ambiguity than was contained in his, [Mr. LOVELL'S.] This measure may be a favorite one with him, but it was better now than as it stood before. The reason he used the word “definite,” was this: the amendment defined the number of persons—taking population as the basis of representation—to be entitled to be heard in our halls of legislation. Taking the proposition as amended by the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. BRITAIN,] it struck him as even still more distinct, because it explicitly said that this portion of our population, no matter what it might be, was to experience the same control over the affairs of the State, as six-sevenths of the people in another part of the country. He was of opinion that gentlemen were mistaken in regard to the organization of those counties. He was not disposed to participate in the formation of organic law upon guess work and supposition; for it might turn out that those districts of country of which gentlemen spoke had not fifty people within their limits. Did gentlemen then propose to place such districts within our Senate and Legislature, upon a basis of fifty in population?

Mr. LOVELL (interposing) remarked that he received his information from the gentleman from Monroe, [Mr. McCLELLAND.] He supposed the information was correct.

Mr. BACKUS resumed, the light which shone upon gentlemen in relation to the population of those counties might yet prove incorrect. He was unwilling, therefore, to act upon that basis. In all candor, he would say that we should not run on madly, and admit counties which had but a name, without reference to their resources, their population, or their taxation. For, the basis of representation must be upon something: all conceded that. It must be either population or taxation, or both combined. Take them both together, and he asked could gentlemen obtain a more liberal rule than that contained in the proposal here made? But it was sought to carry it further. The gentleman from Lapeer [Mr. WHITE] asked us to admit everything that had been organized, without reference to any standard whatever, before the year 1851. For one, he was willing that next year, or the year after, or in six months hence, if a county should present this amount of living population on its surface, (2000) that it should come in and participate in the legislation of the State. If they had not, he would ask upon what possible basis could it be asked at the hands of this Convention, to extend to those counties a participation in controlling our State affairs? Did they ask it upon the basis of property? If so, then extend representation upon that basis to the entire State at large. Did they say population? If it be population, then abide by that.

The county of Mackinac had been adverted to, and it was said that she would be stripped of her Representative. He did not think so. He thought the gentleman from that county would bear him out, when he said that that county, with the country connected with it, contained 3000 inhabitants. The population of Chippewa, he supposed was about 2000. Therefore, the statement did not apply to those counties, but it did to the counties as to which we had no information in relation to their population. He was unwilling, as he said before, to admit them unless it were on some definite basis. If gentlemen said that 2000 was not a liberal basis, he desired that they would propose some other, in order that the people might know what they considered equal to a quota of the residue of the people in this State. He thought then the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. McCLELLAND] to be very definite; as also the one of the gentleman from Lapeer, who asked to have every county admitted after the year 1851.

By consent, Mr. McCLELLAND was allowed to modify his proposition by inserting "1,500," in lieu of "2,000."

After some further slight discussion, the gentleman from Lapeer [Mr. WHITE] withdrew his amendment.

Mr. STOREY moved to strike out "1,500" and insert "2,000;" which was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays being demanded on the adoption of the substitute, the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Adams, Alvord, Arzeno, Barnard, H. Bartow, Britain, Alvarado Brown, Asahel Brown, Burns, Bush, Butterfield, Chapel, Choate, Church, J. Clark, Comstock, Conner, Cook, Cornell, Crary, Crouse, Danforth, Dimond, Eastman, Edmunds, Gale, Gardiner, Hanscom, Hart, Kingsley, Kinne, Lovell, Marvin, Mason, McClelland, McLeod, Mowry, Orr, J. D. Pierce, Robertson, Rix, Robinson, Skinner, Soule, Storey, Sturgis, Sutherland, Town, Walker, Warden, Webster, White, Whipple, Whittemore, Williams, Willard, Woodman—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Axford, Backus, Bagg, Beardsley, Beeson, Ammon Brown, Carr, Chandler, S. Clark, Daniels, Desnoyers, Eaton, Fralick, Gibson, Green, Harvey, Hascall, Hathaway, Hixon, Moore, Mosher, Newberry, O'Brien, N. Pierce, Redfield, E. S. Robinson, M. Robinson, Sullivan, Tiffany, Van Valkenburgh, Wells, Witherell—33.

So the substitute proposed by Mr. McCLELLAND for section three, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, (32d day,) July 17.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the PRESIDENT.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ATTERBURY.

Mr. BRITAIN moved to amend the journal of yesterday by inserting after the substitute proposed by Mr. McCLELLAND to section 3 of the article entitled Legislative Department," the following, viz:

"Mr. White proposed the following as an addition to the substitute, which, after some debate, was withdrawn:

"Provided that each county whose organization on the first day of January, A. D. 1841, shall have been perfected by election of county officers, shall be entitled to at least one Representative."

Mr. BRITAIN—I will give, in a few words, Mr. Chairman, my reasons for wishing to have the journal corrected so that it will be a journal of the proceedings, rather than what it is; as the Convention might be in debate upon some question almost the entire morning, and by our journals not a trace of it be found. In the first place it will cost nothing more. We pay for the blank pages of our journals the same as the printed portion; therefore the expense of printing will not be increased. You employ reporters to report the proceedings of the Convention; your reports and the journals will not correspond. Should this be so? When you read the reports, and open the journals to see if they agree, they do not, because the journals do not contain the proceedings. Half a day may be spent in debate upon a proposition submitted, and afterwards withdrawn, and your reporters, instead of going to the journals for the proposition, have to go and request the person who made it, to write it out from recollection, or endeavor to find it around the Clerk's desk; then, if written out again, I would ask, does this Convention know that proposition, so written out, to be the identical proposition discussed?

The Reporters have told me that persons have said: "it is pretty near the thing, as near as we can get it." Besides, it works great injustice. You give to one member credit for what he is not entitled; to another, who is so, you give no credit. This was the case with Mr. WHITE yesterday; the same with Mr. McCLELLAND, of Monroe, who accepted an amendment against his wish, because he saw it was the will of the Convention, and might prevent the adoption of another proposition which he considered more objectionable than the one accepted by him; all of which could be easily understood if the journals gave the facts as they occurred. But as they do not, how can the gentleman from Monroe excuse himself for modifying his own proposition by admitting into it what he considered as objectionable, without any apparent necessity for it?

Mr. ARZENO—The gentleman from Berrien need not trouble himself about the gentleman from Monroe; he needs no excuse to his constituents.

Mr. BRITAIN—Mr. President: It always gives me pain to be misapprehended, and to have my motives impeached and my statements perverted. Sir, I have not spoken in terms of censure, nor even of disapprobation of the course pursued by the gentleman from Monroe. I have merely said that he modified his own proposition by admitting into it what he considered objectionable himself, without any necessity for it appearing on the journals. Sir, it stands upon the journals as "the man at an auction who raised his own bid," to the gratification of the spectators; when, if the journals gave the truth, he would occupy no such position. I hope this explanation satisfactory to the gentleman from Monroe.

I also made several amendments yesterday, which were accepted by different persons, and for which I received no credit upon the journals. Now, sir, I do not wish to be considered the father of other peoples' measures, nor do I wish them to be considered the father of mine; and we should at once put an end to this rule, which produces so much injustice to members, and was only adopted in the first place by the Secretaries, for their own convenience.

Now, sir, why should these wrongs be permitted? The expense of printing, as already shown, is the same. The clerks are ready to keep the journals properly, if you will permit them. We have the practice of both houses of Congress, acting like ourselves under Jefferson's Manual, as the parliamentary law, to warrant the change. The people, too, suppose that we are doing but little, because a considerable portion of our business does not appear upon our journals. It produces great discrepancy between the reports of the debates and the journals; and the practice of the Legislatures, which we are following, was in violation of the constitution, which requires each house to keep a journal of its proceedings.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE would beg the attention of the House while he read Jefferson's Manual, sec. 49. Our journals are precisely in accordance with that rule. Here are forty propositions presented in the course of debate. They may have been discussed, but no action has been taken upon them; and until action has been taken they have not become the property of the Convention. If my friend sends up a newspaper, then withdraws it, should that go on the journal? The thing is too absurd to discuss.

Mr. COOK—That has no relation. If that view were taken, it would cut off all amendments that were voted down, and everything except what was adopted by the House.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—That is provided for; where there is a vote they are to be entered.

Mr. HANSCOM—The practice in Congress is to enter upon the journals every proposition sent up by a member that is in order.

I concur with the gentleman from Berrien, [Mr. Britain,] in his views, and see no reason why we should not adopt a similar rule. A man might send up a newspaper, but he would act upon his own responsibility, if he chose to be so absurd. The object of the journal is, to give a true reference as to notices, resolutions, &c. Our journals do not show this; yet, in the journals of Congress, you can see how A., B. or C. moved this, or withdrew that.

I think a journal of proceedings should show, not only what is adopted, but that amendments or notices, whether adopted or not, should go on the journals. You can place a man in a most ridiculous attitude by not adopting the rule. For instance, the gentleman from Monroe moved a substitute for a section; the gentleman from Lapeer came in with a proposition that the gentleman from Monroe thought dangerous and destructive; he, seeing from the tone of the Convention, that it was likely to pass, modified his own; and, I would ask, where would his constituents find excuse for a change, except the journals show the reason?

If the proposition of the gentleman from Lapeer had been entered upon the journal, then the modification of the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe would have been perfectly understood. Our practice has been different from Congress. It has been the invariable practice in the State of Michigan, to enter only those propositions upon the journal upon which action has been taken. It is best to let the journal contain all, and let each member send up his motions on his own responsibility; as, by the present method, the debates and the journals do not agree.

Mr. EATON saw a good deal of reason in the argument. A member might send up a motion, and make a long speech upon it; our reporters take down what he says; but if the motion is not in the journal, we may have a sermon without a text. He always wanted a text when he had a sermon.

Mr. GARDINER—That is the point. We are publishing our proceedings and debates. We publish lengthy discussions; and referring to our journal, we find that no such propositions were entered there. I think that they should be entered in the journal so that the reports and the journal would agree. I therefore hope that the rule may be adopted.

Mr. J. D. PIERCE—The journals of the Convention give an account of what is done by the Convention—the reports of what was said. I see no difficulty in continuing the present rule. If we change it we shall have the same thing in two places; as the reports tell what was said, whether acted upon or not. If we adopt the system proposed, we must change our rules.
